The Navajo Indians are one tribe and the Pueblo Indians are other tribes. They live widely apart. Their reservations do not join. Their properties do not touch one another. They are entirely apart; and to hold the position of special assistant to negotiate with the Navajos, representing the department and the Navajos, and at the same time to hold another position on an independent board seems to me might reasonably have given rise to the belief on the part of the Indians that Governor Hagerman would be partisan in their favor and would advocate their rights on the board, and thus it was a mistake for him to occupy both positions.

The act of 1924, called the Pueblo Lands Board act, created a commission of three members-one to represent the President, one to represent the Secretary of the Interior, one to represent the Attorney General-in solving a complicated problem between the Pueblo Indians and the white claimants of land within the several pueblos.

In 1877 the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Pueblo Indians were capable of contracting and being contracted with. Relying upon that decision, many white people, acting with perfect good faith, bought lands from the Indians, dealt with them, and acquired lands within the pueblos. In 1913 the Supreme Court of the United States reversed that position and held that the Pueblo Indians were a restricted people. It necessarily followed that they could not contract or be contracted with.

Arising from that change, people who had dealt with the Indians in good faith, believing they were acquiring rights, found that they had not done so. Many of them had lived there for years and had invested all they had there. Of course, they were in a precarious position, with only equitable rights. Congress recognized such rights in passing the act of 1924.

Governor Hagerman was appointed to represent the Secretary of the Interior on that board. The board appointed appraisers, men of their own selection, to appraise the land. The present governor of the State of New Mexico, a banker, a business man of wide experience, was one of the appraisers. They fixed their figures, totaling about $2,000,000. Deducting what we will call the Taos claim, which the Indians surrendered in lieu of the promise made to them that the Blue Lake area would be granted them, the total figures of the appraisers amounted to about $1,300,000.

The board, dominated by Mr. Hagerman, awarded the Indians about $600,000, or $775,000 less than the appraisers appointed by the board had fixed as the reasonable value of their lands and water rights appurtenant thereto lost through negligence of the Government.

The explanation given by Governor Hagerman now is that in fixing the awards the board undertook to divide water water rights, and undertook to compensate the Indians for secondary water rights but not to compensate them for their primary water rights. That theory, so far as I know, was never advanced until three or four weeks ago, when the Committee on Indian Affairs had under consideration a bill, which is now pending on the calendar, to authorize an appropriation of about $775,000 as additional compensation to these Indians, such sum being required to pay them for their lands and water rights as required by the act of 1924.

The Committee on Indian Affairs of the body at the other end of the Capitol on yesterday reported favorably a similar bill, and it is now on the calendar there.

Mr. President, after seven years of effort on the part of that board-with expense to the Government of almost a quarter of a million dollars to conduct that work-we are now confronted with a board having failed to follow the act, thus requiring this additional legislation to correct a mistake in the face of the plain mandate of the statute, which was to ascertain lands lost and the water rights appurtenant thereto, and to fix the value of the land and the water rights. The act did not give the board any authority to divide water into two parts and to compensate the Indians for one part and not compensate them for the other part

Furthermore, Mr. President, a decree of court has been rendered respecting each pueblo quieting the title of the white claimants to the lands found by the board to belong to them, with the water rights appurtenant thereto. Every white claimant is protected by a decree entered by the United States District Court for the District of New Mexico in a case to which the United States was a part and represented by counsel, quieting the title to those lands decreed in the white owners with the appurtenant water rights

My concept of the matter is that the Indians have lost those lands and they have lost the water rights appurtenant thereto; that the whites are protected in the ownership of the land and the water rights by decree of the court. The only way in which justice will be done to those Indians is to compensate them for the water rights lost along with the lands. The whole thing arose out of negligence on the part of the Government. The Indians were helpless. They were wards of the Government and had a right to look to their guardian to protect them.

The whites were blameless in the situation because the Supreme Court of the United States had held in 1877 that these Indians were capable of contracting and being contracted with. If so, they could lose title and be bound in such loss the same as any other unrestricted person in the country could do; and so, the whole situation growing out of the negligence of the Government, places upon the Government the obligation to correct it, not by dispossessing blameless whites but by compensating blameless Indians with money.

The act provides that with the money appropriated the Secretary of the Interior shall buy other lands and water for the Indians. It has been said by some that the whole purpose was to strip the Indians and leave them penniless and to enrich the whites. Not at all. The very foundation of the act was to compensate the Indians with an appropriation and use the money to buy other lands and other waters for them. That is where the blame should rest, and that is the way the error should be corrected; that is to say, by the Government bearing the burden of it.

I think a great deal of this situation was due to Mr. Hagerman's domination of the board and his failure to follow the mandate of the act. If he had followed the statute, we would not be involved in this troublesome situation. I repeat what I said on the floor the other day, that in the first pueblo, called Tesuque, the board awarded the Indians $100 an acre for their water rights without any effort to divide it into primary and secondary parts, but in subsequent pueblos they fixed an arbitrary figure of $35 an acre for land and water rights.

There is no substantial difference in the value of the land rights into two parts, primary water rights and secondary and water rights in the several pueblos. The justification now is that the board decided, following the Tesuque case, | that it would compensate the Indians only for secondary water rights and leave open, unadjudicated, undetermined, for settlement in the distant future in some forum unknown to them or anybody else the primary water rights, when the act was just as plain, just as stern, just as fixed, and just as strict in its provisions with respect to loss of water as it was with respect to the loss of land. The trouble arose from a wrong concept of the act, from a maladministration of its provisions, which I hope will be corrected by the passage of the bill in substance as it is now pending on the calendar.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I repeat, that in voting for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier], I take into consideration two or three elements of the situation. This position is not needed. It is unnecessary. The Bureau of Indian Affairs can conduct the affairs of the Indians without a special assistant to negotiate with them. Adoption of the amendment will effect an economy. Small though it be, it is a step in the right direction.

I think Governor Hagerman's usefulness for this particular provision—bear in mind the title of the position is "special assistant to negotiate with the Indians "-has been impaired. Resulting from criticism raised from time to time during 18 months or so, Governor Hagerman's usefulness in this particular position, his fitness for this particular position has been gravely impaired, if not entirely destroyed. But, Mr. President, let me conclude by repeating what I said in the outset, that in casting that vote I do so reaffirming my high regard for Governor Hagerman as a man of honor, of integrity and ability. I surrender none of my esteem for him in those respects in voting for the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this morning I received a telegram, which I desire to read, addressed to me and coming from Santa Fe, N. Mex.:

SANTA FE., N. MEX., March 16, 1932.

Hon. REED SMOOT, United States Senate, Washington:

Re proposed amendment to strike out salary of Herbert J. Hager-He proposed amendment to strike out salary of Herbert J. Hagerman from Department of Interior appropriations. We believe this would be highly detrimental to best interests of Indians. We indorse Hagerman's record. See Secretary Wilbur's statement, March 10, Congarssional Record, refuting charges against Hagerman. We feel that it would be extremely unfortunate if the vexing problem of consolidation of Navajo lands, on which Hagerman has done remarkable work and which seems to be approaching a solution, should again fail through his removal.

Executive Committee New Mexico

ASSOCIATION ON INDIAN AFFAIRS, JOHN MEEM, Chairman.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, for many years-possibly for 40 years, certainly for 30 years—there has been a belief entertained by some persons that on the part of the Indian Bureau, on the part of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whoever he might be, there has been an attempt made from time to time to deprive the Indian of his rights. It is a strange attitude for me to assume to rise apparently as a defender of any bureau of the Government when I am in opposition to the administration. But I should not be wholly at peace with myself if I withheld remarks at this

A flood of vituperation has been poured upon not only the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs but upon the various commissioners of Indian Affairs who have held that office for the past 20 years. Let me ascend the stream of immediate history to its source. Let me go back 19 years.

Under the Wilson administration Mr. Cato Sells, a Democrat of Texas, was the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The assistant commissioner was Mr. Edgar B. Meritt, a Democrat of Arkansas. Under the Harding-Coolidge administrations the commissioner was Mr. Charles H. Burke, a Republican of South Dakota, and the assistant commissioner was Mr. Edgar B. Meritt, Democrat of Arkansas. Under the Hoover administration thus far Mr. Charles J. Rhoads, Republican of Pennsylvania, has been the commissioner, and Mr. J. Henry Scattergood, of Pennsylvania, has been the assistant commissioner.

Mr. President, in my opinion, when the historian shall come to estimate the characters of these men, Messrs. Sells, Meritt, Burke, Rhoads, and Scattergood-if, indeed, history deigns to notice any of them or any of us now in the Senate—history must write down that they were faithful trustees of this great trust. Not one of the men whose names I have mentioned had any other thought as an official in the Indian Bureau except to serve the Indians as best he could with the lights before him. It has never been even suggested that one of them might-

Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee Where thrift might follow fawning.

Not one of these men lined his pockets with an unclean penny. Not one of these men in the Indian Office ever bought or sold, yet a flood of malediction and traducement has been poured over them from time to time by men equally as honest, equally as sincere, and equally as devoted to the cause of the Indians.

Mr. President, in order to demonstrate that I am not on many subjects in accord with the Bureau of Indian Affairs I need only to mention that it is difficult for me to restrain my indignation when I read some of the bills that the Indian Bureau has caused to be introduced in this Congress encroaching upon the rights of the white citizens, and attempting as it were by legislation to take away from the white citizens their legal, valid, and subsisting rights—such, for example, as House bill 8824, which proposes to return certain lands to the San Carlos White Mountain Indians in Arizona, and its companion bill, Senate bill 3510, which proposes the same thing, and which bills would confiscate the rights of the white settlers who have been upon those lands for more than 35 years past.

So, Mr. President, the complaint I have to make against the Indian Bureau and the complaint that I have against those officials of the past is and was that they appeared at times to be almost fanatical in their zeal to protect the Indians. They disregarded the rights of the white settlers. They sought to take away from the white settlers lands and other rights which in truth, in law, in fact, and in practical effect belonged to the white citizens.

Mr. President, it was quite refreshing to hear the speech of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Bratton]. With calm and judicial locution, becoming the great lawyer that he is, he spoke of the difficulty that inheres in respect to the Indian problem. After so many hours of denunciation, after such a flail of abuse as has fallen upon the officers of the Indian Bureau, it was, I say, pleasing and refreshing to hear a word spoken in justice respecting these officials of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. President, at the instance, I believe, and in pursuance of a resolution presented by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. King], a subcommittee was created of the Committee on Indian Affairs to visit the various Indian reservations of the United States and give a hearing to the Indians. Not in my experience has any committee performed a duty with more fidelity; never in my experience was a subcommittee engaged in a work more arduous, more laborious, than the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. That subcommittee consisted of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier] as chairman, the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] as a member, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas] as a member, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette] as a member, and for a while the former Senator from Oklahoma, Mr. Pine, was a member.

Mr. President, when that subcommittee, pursuing its arduous labors, visited the State of Arizona they cordially invited me to accompany them, and I received a sample of what real committee work was. They visited remote hills and valleys where dwell the lonely, humble Indians who had never before seen an official of the United States Government except an Indian superintendent. I wish to say that those who feel disposed to interest themselves in Indian affairs should read the several thousand pages of testimony taken by that subcommittee. Upon that subcommittee there were some of the finest and most superb intellects of the Senate-my learned friend from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier], learned in Indian affairs, who, with almost apostolic zeal, has devoted himself to the welfare and the rights of the Indians; the able junior Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler]; and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette], although he was unable to visit Arizona.

Mr. President, before that subcommittee, which held hearings in a score or more of places in Arizona, the lowliest and most humble Indian had his day in court; his grievances were heard and corrective legislation was recommended.

We found no graft; we found no evidences of any white citizens attempting to steal anything from the Indians; but, on the contrary, found that when the Indian came into court if ever the scales were inclined at all they were inclined in the Indian's favor, and justly so.

The honorable committee kept insisting that the boundaries of certain Indian reservations in Arizona should be extended, and that the white settlers, who had resided there for 50 or more years, should abandon their holdings and go away, and that their lands should be confiscated for the benefit of the Indians. Indeed, Mr. President, the subcommittee, like the Bureau of Indian Affairs, at times, it seemed to me, were so zealous in behalf of the Indians that they sometimes disregarded the valid, legal, subsisting rights of white settlers and taxpayers.

Let it not be forgotten that a vast area of Arizona is now embraced in Indian reservations. When land is put into an Indian reservation it is withdrawn from white settlement.

So, Mr. President, it has been my duty to resist the efforts of the Indian Bureau, and to resist the efforts of this subcommittee, in their attempts to increase the areas of reservations in Arizona, not because I am oblivious to the rights of the Indians, but because, so far as Arizona is concerned, the Indian reservation lands are now out of all bounds; they are greater than is necessary.

Mr. President, life is, indeed, opulent with strange ironies but the strangest irony of which I have heard lately is that the Indian Bureau should be accused of surrendering the land of the Indians and of improvidently disposing of Indian rights when at the same time others can make out a good case against the Indian Bureau because it has at all times attempted to take in more land for the alleged benefit of the Indian, when in truth the Indian did not need such land.

As to the present controversy respecting Mr. Hagerman, I have nothing to say because I long ago gave up the habit of attempting to talk about a subject upon which I have no information. My colleague [Senator Hayden] is very familiar with that subject and has addressed the Senate upon it. I want it understood that I do not doubt the integrity or the zeal of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier] for the Indians; I do not at all doubt the integrity or the zeal of the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] in behalf of the Indians; but, Mr. President, it is written, not only in profane but in sacred history, of some men whose zeal outran their knowledge.

Mr. President, I did not file any conclusions or submit any reports in connection with the Indian subcommittee that held hearings in Arizona because I was only an ex officio member invited to sit with them when they were in the particular State which in part I represent; but I kept a journal, as has been my habit for years, and I shall now permit the Senate to glance into one of its pages, as it relates to Indian affairs. We had finished our labors upon the great Navajo and Hopi Reservations and had gone to the Grand Canyon, where on Wednesday evening, May 20, 1931, I made the following entry in my journal:

Held hearings at Tuba and then left the enchanted domain—the Navajo and Hopi Indian Reservations—where dwell 43,000 Navajos and 2,800 Hopis, tribes of keen perception and opulent with mythological lore.

I shall carry with me vivid impressions of that land of the corn chant and the rain bringers' song—of the snake dance and the antelope dance—that land of sunshine, far-flung distances, mirages, and rich colors, of high mesas heavy with cedar, juniper, piñon, and pine, of painted deserts and treacherous sands, of blankets and baskets woven, and red-clay pots and jars molded by handicraft born of artistic skill and long-enduring patience, of patriarchal natives with leathery faces going about their concerns in silence, Indian families on sun-scorched hills tending their flocks—a land where most of the adults are mortally afraid of the dead, are superstitious, wear much turquoise and silver ornament, and retain their dances, customs, and songs which were old when the first Witangemota assembled in England—a land of few springs, but with much water flowing underground.

The Navajos are nomadic and pastoral and try to placate angry and evil spirits; the Hopis are sedentary and agricultural and implore the aid of beneficent spirits.

Mr. President, skipping a day, I read from another entry:

Friday, May 22, 1931: My field work with the subcommittee is finished. Excellent work has been done by the Indian Bureau during the past decade for Arizona Indians, viz: Land disputes adjusted; irrigation systems built; wells sunk; tanks dug; livestock increased and improved; grazing lands protected; deserts reclaimed; agriculture promoted; manual training, domestic science, and sanitation taught; bootlegging measurably stopped; spiritual comfort offered; schools, hospitals, and sawmills erected; wild horses exterminated; rodents warred upon; arts and crafts encouraged; dairying, poultry raising, and truck gardening established.

The Arizona Indian is being molded into a self-supporting citizen, learning the inviolability of contracts, the rewards of industry, and justifying and in not a few instances repaying the expense to which the Government has been put in his behalf.

Mr. President, in this world of so much distress and so much travail it is worth while as we pass through, if we can not be charitable, at least to be just. There stands no one here who is in oppugnancy to certain policies in the Indian Bureau more than am I. I shall fight to the finish, as will my colleague and the honorable Member of the House of Representatives from Arizona, the attempt on the part of the bureau to extend and increase the lands of the Indians in Arizona, but that ought not to preclude us and shall not preclude us from rendering justice where justice is due. Measuring the present Indian problem in Arizona by the space of the past 20 years, I am astounded at the progress which has been made.

Mr. President, it has never appealed to me to take a forked stick and look about for something where I can pinion it and then lift it before the public and say, "What a nasty mess I have found." That never appealed to me; but I am gratified when I am able to commend officials, whether they be Democrats or Republicans.

Mr. President, I would not have it understood that the Congress or the Indian Bureau are the only agencies interested in behalf of the Indians. There is a gentleman who traveled with the subcommittee, Mr. John Collier, who represents the American Indian Defense Association, a scholar, with whom it is a delight to talk, a gentleman by birth and training. I am in opposition to some of his policies, but I would be wholly lacking in fairness if I closed these remarks without saying that, much as I disagree with Mr. Collier on some questions, I honor him for the great work he has done for the Indians. The striking of intellect against intellect and the clash of idea against idea causes the truth to fly out like sparks from flints, and I want the Record to show that while I do not agree with Mr. Collier in many of his ideas it will be a sad day for the Indians when he separates himself from the great work he is doing in their behalf.

Moreover, vast numbers of people in private life have interested themselves in the Indian's welfare. Our novelists—and to my mind one of the greatest of our novelists, Mr. Hamlin Garland—have interested themselves in Indian life and Indian culture. I could name them by the score. They come from every State. Not only the clergymen of the country but thousands, even millions, of other citizens of humanitarian impulse have interested themselves in the Indian.

I want, so far as my voice will carry, to say that the Indian Bureau for 20 years past has been zealous and whole-hearted with respect to the progress of the Indian. I repeate that not a single commissioner or assistant commissioner in my time has ever been accused of trying to line his pockets with pelf or of trying to override or overreach the Indian.

Mr. President, before I conclude my address I wish to say that every Indian of the United States is a citizen of the United States. None other than the distinguished Vice President himself is of Indian ancestry; and he ought to be, and is, proud of it. We hear a vast deal about General Washington-and who does not revere him?-a dignified gentleman; the ordinary Indian is also a dignified man, and nature has dignified him. No rules of society polished the ordinary American Indian. I repeat, none other than the distinguished Vice President, then a Senator, introduced the bill-and I am of opinion that it passed both Houses unanimously-making all Indians born in the United States. whether tribal or otherwise, citizens of the United States. I do not doubt the zeal of Senators for the Indians. I do not doubt their whole-hearted effort to serve the Indians. My objection is that in trying to serve the Indians they all too frequently attempt to confiscate the rights of the whites for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators have answer to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier].

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah read a telegram that he had received this morning from some one in New Mexico. I do not know who it was, but apparently it was no one connected with the Indian Service. and perhaps no one that knew anything about the situation. I desire, however, to call attention to the fact that I have on my desk here letters from Indians-very prominent Indians. I read extracts from these letters yesterday. I withheld the names of the Indians, but if any Senator wants to see the letters and the signatures, I should be glad to have them look at them.

This Indian, under date of February 27, makes this state-

Mr. Hagerman has been in the service about seven and a half years and has never done anything for the Navajos. The most we have ever seen of him is five or six times at the tribal council at different places. I hate to say this, but he has never done the Navajos any good, and I do not believe he has done the Government any good, either.

I have letters of a similar nature from two other prominent Indians out there. The other two are members of the tribal council. I have editorials from two of the leading papers published in New Mexico under recent dates, and they make a similar statement.

The subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs. after a thorough investigation, after going out on the ground and holding investigations there, after listening to an attorney who was paid by some so-called Indian welfare organizations a thousand dollars to come before our committee to represent Mr. Hagerman's case, were unanimous in their opinion, after reviewing all the testimony and the facts that we have found, that Mr. Hagerman should not retain this

Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be adopted. The Indians do not want him; and I am satisfied that there is no good reason for his holding the position.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from North Dakota I desire to state that this telegram that I read into the RECORD-I will not take time to reread it-is signed by John Meem, chairman of the executive committee of the New Mexico Association of Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said: Mr. President, I have just been handed a telegram. It will do no good to put it in the RECORD at this time but because I am asked to do so, I wish to read it. It reads as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 17, 1932.

Hon. REED SMOOT,

United States Senate:

United States Senate:
Referring appropriation bill Department Interior, in our judgment removal of Herbert Hagerman would be most detrimental to best interest of Indians of Southwest, especially Navajos, while problem of their land consolidation on Navajo Reservation is unsolved.

EASTERN ASSOCIATION ON INDIAN AFFAIRS, By PERCY JACKSON, Treasurer,

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 54, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "$1,507,480" and insert in lieu thereof

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that simply reduces the amount of the salary to be paid, together with the expenses.

Mr. KING. It just corrects the total.

Mr. SMOOT. Virtually that is the effect of it, to correct the total, and it ought to be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote by which the committee amendment was previously agreed to would first have to be reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, which I ask to have reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 47, line 8, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

Not to exceed $500,000 of the appropriations herein specified for Indian educational purposes shall be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the construction of new day schools, the enlargement of existing day schools, the provision of transportation facilities between Indian homes and day schools, and for other purposes necessary to a substitution of day-school for boarding-school facilities, wherever, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, it is practicable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in support of the amendment, I desire to offer for the record a few statements bearing on the Indian school situation. It will be observed that the purpose of the amendment is to enable the Indian Bureau to use part of the appropriation for the establishment of day schools for the Indian children. I think experience has demonstrated that the boarding schools have not been satisfactory and have failed to achieve the results desired.

In 1928 the Institute for Governmental Research, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Hubert Work, made a thorough survey of the Indian problem and submitted what is known as the Meriam report. It, therefore, may be denominated as an official report. Among those who participated in the survey was Dr. W. Carson Ryan, jr., who is now director of the division of education in the Bureau of Indian Affairs. There were 11 specialists who made the survey and joined in the report, consisting of a volume of more than 800 pages. Doctor Ryan, as I understand, wrote that part of the report dealing with education. Speaking of the schools conducted by the Indian Bureau, the report states (p. 192):

That the Indian children in boarding schools are generally below normal in health as compared with white children.

On page 316 the following paragraph appears:

Every available space that will accommodate beds is often pressed into service. Thus children are frequently quartered on attic floors in closely placed beds with the same lack of light and air. Not infrequently in these attic dormitories the fire hazard is serious. In a school recently renovated, for example, 70 girls were quartered on the third floor in a building of temporary construction. The only fire escape was located off the stairway at the rear of the building. The entrance to this escape was securely locked and the matron kept the key. • • Locked fire escapes and nailed windows were sometimes found in girls' dormitories.

Without reading, I ask that further excerpts from the report be inserted.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the report, as follows:

The majority of the classroom buildings are not provided with sanitary facilities (p. 322).

Children with infectious diseases can not under these conditions be segregated. Contagious diseases can not under these conditions be segregated. Contagious diseases under these conditions have almost free scope (p. 292).

At one of the leading schools, medical examinations of the children were seen being put through at the rate of 72 an hour (p. 192).

The prevalence of tuberculosis in the boarding schools is alarming (p. 206).

Children in advanced stages of tuberculosis are frequently returned from the boarding schools to their homes, where no adequate provision is made for their care or for the protection of other members of the family from contagion (p. 206).

The whole machinery of the routinized boarding school and agency life works against the kind of initiative and independence, school and the development of which should be the chief aim of Indian education in and out of school (p. 351).

These things are bad (overcrowding, lack of privacy, lack of food, lack of cleanliness in the schools), but even more serious are the standards of education and training represented by the personnel. * * * The employees are, as a rule, not qualified personnel. * for work in educational institutions (p. 624).

In almost no case could a reasonably clean bill of health be given to any one school. * * The generally routinized nature of the institutional life with its formalism in classrooms, its marching and dress parades, its annihilation of initiative, its lack of beauty, its almost complete negation of normal family life, all of which have disastrous effects upon mental health and the development of wholesome personality (p. 393).

Mr. KING. From the foregoing it is apparent that Doctor Ryan and those who collaborated with him in the report were not satisfied with the boarding-school system, which occupied such a conspicuous place in the Indian educational system. I think the evidences are overwhelming that the boarding schools have not been satisfactory. Most of the Indian children who have attended the boarding schools have gone from the same without being equipped to meet the responsibilities of citizenship or to engage in pursuits from which they might obtain a livelihood.

In the light of the facts, and of the statements made by Doctor Ryan in the report just quoted, it is singular that the present Indian Bureau administration has done so little toward the establishment of day schools and adopting methods other than the boarding schools for the purpose of educating the Indian children and preparing them to meet conditions confronting them in life.

I find in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1931, the following statement:

Boarding-school education is considerable more expensive than any other kind even where carried out at the extremely low cost prevailing in the elementary Indian Service.

I might add that the facts do not warrant the statement to the effect that the costs are "extremely low."

Continuing with the report just referred to:

By reducing the enrollment of a number of the schools we not only can lessen the institutional difficulties but we can release some of the money badly needed for the program of local and community education. It is estimated that the same sum of money that is required for 100 children of elementary-school age in a boarding school will provide an adequate educational program, including necessary food, clothing, and follow-up service, for at least half as many more, if expended in the local community, and with better ultimate results. • • • It is both better economy and better education to leave the children in their own homes.

In the commissioner's report, on page 5, this language

Opportunities to put Indian children into local schools rather than Government boarding schools exceeded the available financial resources in 1930-31. • • Reports already received show resources in 1930-31. • Reports already received show more than 34,000 Indian children in public schools for the year ended June 30, 1931. There is little racial prejudice anywhere against Indian children. The supervisor assigned to public-school relations reports • • and the teachers take considerable pride in seeing the Indian child develop alongside the white child.

The commissioner reports-

That if the Indian Service were starting afresh on the task of Indian education it would begin with the Indian people in their own environment or in some comparable environment in which they could develop their own resources.

This indicates that the boarding-school system has not met the needs of the Indians and that the proper system would have been to establish day schools at or near the homes of the Indians instead of dragging them hundreds, and in some instances, thousands of miles way, separating them from their families and producing a psychological condition not compatible with the highest development of the children.

Referring to the report on page 4, this language is found:

It would employ other methods than some of those that have been employed—it would not use to any extent the reservation rations or distant boarding schools for young children. * * * The basic Indian Service educational problem, therefore, is to work over from a more or less conventional institutional conception of education to one that is local and individual. It means abandoning boarding schools wherever possible, eliminating small children from the larger boarding schools, setting up day schools, or making arrangements with local public schools to receive these children, providing the necessary family follow-up for such children, and directing the boarding schools into specialized purposes at least partly vocational; in the meantime all these boarding schools (those that should be abandoned soon, as well as those that have a degree of permanence) should be made as effective educationally as it is possible to make them, utilizing Indian arts

Evidently the statements contained in the commissioner's reports are the views of Doctor Ryan, and it is remarkable that his views have not received greater consideration, and the changes which the adoption of his plan would inevitably bring about have not been made.

To show the extent to which the bureau has committed itself to the boarding-school system, I invite attention to a number of statistics.

The total appropriations for Indian schools for 1932 were as follows:

Gratuities____ ..... $10, 944, 000 Tribal__ 891.000

I might add that in the present bill the total appropriations for education for the next fiscal year aggregate $10,671,000, of which $803,000 come from tribal funds. Of the total appropriation above stated, for 1932, $10,285,000 was devoted to the maintenance of boarding schools and only $1,550,000 to all other schools. In the Government boarding schools there were 21,258 Indian children; in the mission contract boarding schools, 2,736, making a total of

The cost of each child to the Government amounted to $429—quite in contrast to the statement to the effect that the costs "were extremely low."

The number of Indian children in day schools, using the average attendance for 1931, as shown by the commissioner's report for that year, was as follows:

Those in public schools receiving tuition from the Indian Bureau appropriation numbered 36,753. Children in the Indian Bureau day schools numbered only 3,729, or a total of 40,482. The cost per child in all day schools was only $38.

I might add that in the last three years the Indian Bureau has abolished only three boarding schools out of 76; they were small schools, one at Fort Bidwell, Calif.; one at Fort Mojave, in Arizona; and the third at Mekusukey, Okla. These schools had a capacity of only 2.2 per cent of the entire boarding-school capacity. I understand that the plan is to abolish three other boarding schools. If that shall be done, the total reduction in boarding-school capacity will be but 3.2 per cent. It is a fact that the boarding schools are overcrowded. The congestion is so great as to imperil the health if not the lives of the children. Certain it is that the health and the morale of the children would be infinitely better if they were transferred from boarding schools to community day schools. The purpose of the amendment is to aid in bringing about that result. Personally, I favored making the amendment mandatory; but in view of what I believe to be the desire of Doctor Ryan to as fast as possible change from the boarding-school system to the community day-school system, I have felt constrained not to ask for a mandatory provision. If, however, during the coming year the archaic and unsatisfactory boarding-school system is continued and no progressive plan has been substituted, I shall urge the Senate, when the next appropriation bill is presented, to insert provisions that will compel the Indian Bureau to inaugurate a day-school system and thus secure more satisfactory results and the saving of millions of dollars to the Indians as well as to the Government.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, on page 6, I move to strike out the amounts inserted in the first five lines, which have to do with the Board of Indian Commissioners. A motion formerly submitted along the same line was voted down. The committee presented an amendment reducing the total appropriation by $2,300, and that amendment was agreed to. The amount stricken out represented the salary of a clerk or stenographer, as I understand. If this Board of Indian Commissioners are to be of any benefit to the Indians or to the bureau or to the Government, it seems to me they should be allowed to get out their reports, and they say they need these employees. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the two committee amendments on lines 3 and 4, page 6, were agreed to, be reconsidered.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the reconsideration, nor have I any objection to rejecting the committee amendments.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not think there was a sufficient showing that they needed the additional employees, and I think what the committee did ought to stand.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a moment ago I was in opposition to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier]. I have examined this item carefully, and I believe the Senator from North Dakota is right now. I do not think it is fair to the Board of Indian Commissioners, or to ourselves, after we have voted to keep them, to refuse to give them the proper clerical assistance. It would not be fair to the Board of Indian Commissioners, and I hope that what the Senator from North Dakota asks may be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope what the Senator advocates may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the votes by which the committee amendments were agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered, and the question now is on agreeing to the committee amendments on page 6, lines 3 and 4. The two amendments will be stated and will be voted on together.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 3, strike out "$14,100" and insert in lieu thereof "$11,800," and strike out "$9,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,700," so as to read:

EXPENSES OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS

For expenses of the Board of Indian Commissioners, $11,800, of which amount not to exceed $6,700 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], who is absent from the city, requested that I submit four amendments which he expected to offer had he been here. I send them to the desk and ask that they be reported one at a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the first amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota moves, on behalf of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], on page 38, line 18, to insert:

Provided further, For completion of public-school building at Fraser, Mont., and for necessary equipment for manual, laboratory, and other lines of training $15,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment that it was not estimated for and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 56, line 19, strike out "$40,-000" and insert in lieu thereof "$30,000."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word on this amendment. It reduces the appropriation in the item for the Flathead Indians in Montana by $10,000, from $40,000 to $30,000. I have a letter here from the president of the tribal council of the Flathead Indians. They say there are some employees the Indians do not want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 64, line 19, after the word "Interior," the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier], on behalf of the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], proposes to insert:

CARE OF INDIGENT INDIANS

For reimbursement to Cascade and Hill Counties, State of Montana, for hospitalization and subsistence for certain indigent ward and nonward Indians resident within such State, but not within any established reservation, $13,383.77, of which $6,726.16 shall be paid to Cascade County and $6,757.61 shall be paid to Hill County.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 98, line 19, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier], on behalf of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], proposes to strike out the figures "$280,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$285,600."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that, I am quite sure, is correct. The Commissioner of Education thinks it is very important. It is merely inserting, by means of this amendment, what has appeared in former bills in the past.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite my colleague's attention, and the attention of other Senators, to an item on page 100. We have just voted $286,000 for the office of the Bureau of Education for salaries, and so forth. I find on page 100 this provision:

For all expenses, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase and rental of equipment, purchase of supplies, traveling expenses, printing, and all other incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, to enable the Secretary of the Interior, through the Office of Education, at a total cost of not to exceed $350,000, to make a study of the sources and apportionment of school revenues and their expenditure, $50,000.

They have already had $50,000. They want $50,000 more to inquire of the States the sources of their incomes for education and the apportionment of the same.

I stated yesterday that we could get that information in two days by wiring to the superintendents of education throughout the United States, and I move to strike out the item on page 100, lines 4 to 16, inclusive. It is wholly unnecessary and means a useless expenditure of public money.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the appropriation was $100,-000 last year, and that has been cut to $50,000. No information regarding this item has been furnished me in such shape that I could state positively that the appropriation is necessary. Therefore I say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing that the provision should go out, and the matter go to conference, and we may learn something more about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I give notice that when the pending bill shall be disposed of, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the anti-injunction bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have prepared a number of amendments dealing with the appropriations carried in the bill for irrigation purposes and for so-called reclamation projects. I have amendments prepared dealing particularly with the Blackfeet, Klamath, and Flathead Reservations. I intended to call the attention of the Senate to the Preston-Engle report, which is a severe indictment of the Indian Bureau, its waste and extravagance in handling irrigation projects. This report, as some Senators know, was made by competent engineers selected by Secretary Work. Their report covers 500 pages of closely printed material, and presents facts and figures and data conclusively establishing that a number of the irrigation projects ought never to have been begun and that others have been carried forward in a wasteful and inefficient manner.

The irrigation policy of the Indian Bureau has core the Government and the Indians more than $46,000,000, and to complete the projects will cost at least $31,000,000 more. The total number of acres now irrigated by the Indians is approximately 120,000, and there is nothing to indicate that there will be any considerable increase in lands actually irrigated by the Indians. The projects as a whole are already expanded more than twice the acreage actually being irrigated by the Indians and whites together. It would not be inaccurate to state that the projects seem to have been constructed for the benefit of the whites rather than for the benefit of the Indians.

On the Blackfeet Reservation, notwithstanding the cost of $1,500,000, the number of acres irrigated by Indians last year was only 35.

The cost for each irrigated acre on the Flathead Reservation now exceeds $160 although the value of each irrigated acre is stated by the Indian Bureau to be only $30.

On the Klamath Reservation, the irrigation system has cost more than $500 for each irrigated acre, and an irrigated acre is worth not more than $40.

The record of the bureau's irrigation activities calls for criticism. The Preston-Engle report demands reorganization of the entire system, curtailment of costs, abandonment of a number of projects, and suspension of any further construction on a majority of the projects. It also recommends that some of the projects be transferred from the Indian Bureau to the Reclamation Service, evidently because of the inefficiency, waste, and extravagance of the Indian Bureau and the grave injustices which, under its administration, have been inflicted upon the Indians.

One of the items in the bill before us calls for $100,000 for the beginning of the construction of a pumping plant on the Flathead Reservation. I might add that this irrigation project to date has cost more than $6,000,000, and no one knows what the additional cost will be if the Indian Bureau persists in its present purpose to carry forward its program.

The Indian investigating committee, of which Senator Frazier is chairman, visited the reservation in July, 1930, and took testimony concerning the project and cognate matters. During the investigation Senator Wheeler, a member of the committee, said:

They claim they have 120,000 acres under the irrigation system. The records show that but 33,000 are irrigated. They admit that they have a gravity flow for 80,000 acres, or over twice the acreage now in irrigation, yet for the past 15 years they have advocated a large addition to the system, and propose a plan to pump water at an elevation of 325 feet through the Newell Tunnell and confiscate the tribal ownership of its power site. What do you know about that?

In reply to Senator Wheeler's question Mr. Lemery, spokesman of the tribal council, said:

It is not feasible or practical in any sense. Too much money has already been spent on the irrigation project which is of no practical use.

He further stated that-

The Indians had protested from the beginning against the irrigation plan, and that they are still protesting, and contend that the land has been practically confiscated by liens assessed against it over a period of years, and that there are not 750 acres under the whole irrigation project irrigated by Indians, and many thousands of acres have been abandoned by Indians and whites alike.

He also stated that the-Policy of the Government was ruining the Indians and threatened the destruction of the Flathead Valley, and that the construction charges and the cost of maintenance and other operations are so high that it is impossible to raise enough on the land to pay for the water, and the accumulated charges are more than the land is worth.

The area of the Flathead project that can be irrigated by the existing supply of gravity water is more than twice the aggregate area being irrigated by Indians and whites together. The pumping project is therefore completely superfluous, even if it were feasible, and the Montana State Public Service Commission has declared that it is not.

Mr. President, so much time has been consumed in the discussion of the bill and the Senators are anxious that the measure be passed before adjournment that I shall waive my purpose to discuss these irrigation projects and to offer amendments which I think should be adopted. I regret that the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate did not more fully examine into these irrigation items carried in the bill and eliminate many of them and reduce the remainder to reasonable proportions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before that is done, if it is in order, I wish to offer a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order either before or after the third reading of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall wait until after the third reading of the bill then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time? The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read the third time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now offer the following motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Tennessee submits the following motion:

I move that the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back to the Senate with amendments providing an aggregate reduction of 10 per cent in the amount of the appropriations contained in the bill as received from the House of Representatives.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President, this proposal has been before the Senate for several days. It has been explained fully. I believe every Senator knows exactly what it is, and I do not care to argue the matter further.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I understand there is going to be quite a bit of debate on the motion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. I am told by several Senators that there will be. I am anxious to have the conference report on the anti-injunction bill disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it will take long to dispose of my motion. I think we will make better time if we go ahead with it now.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection if we can have action on the anti-injunction conference report this afternoon.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I shall submit an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, reading as follows:

Add to the language proposed by the Senator from Tennessee the following:

The President is hereby authorized and empowered to consolidate bureaus, divisions, and commissions, in whole or in part, and make any related changes in administration he may deem advisable, including transfer of these functions from one department to another, or from any subdivision of a department to another subdivision, so as to perfect economies and keep expenditures within the reduced appropriations herein set out.

In briefly presenting the merits of the proposition I start again, as I started last Friday under less auspicious circumstances, by submitting to the Senate the words of Vice President Marshall on July 15, 1916, as they appear on page 116 of the parliamentary decisions of the Senate, reading as follows:

Notwithstanding the rule of the Senate to the effect that general legislation may not be attached to an appropriation bill, still when the House of Representatives opens the door and proceeds to enter upon a field of general legislation which has to do with subset of this character, the Chair is going to rule that the House having opened the door the Senate of the United States may walk in through the door and pursue the field.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Does the question of the parliamentary situation arise at this time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I was about to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that if he himself raises the parliamentary question on his own amendment it will be quite a different issue from considering the amendment without any parliamentary question being raised. So far as I know, no issue of the admissibility of the amendment under parliamentary usage has been raised, but that does not conclude the question as to whether it would be subject to a point of order or is subject to one now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not raising any parliamentary question. I am quoting the language of Vice President Marshall because I want to indicate that I think the logic set out in his abstract statement, not the parliamentary law but the philosophy of action, applies as a philosophy of action to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator if he does not feel it is time enough to discuss the parliamentary issue if one is raised?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not discussing the parliamentary issue. I am trying to say to the Senator that I want to use the language of Vice President Marshall for the purpose of indicating my objective, and that objective is to pursue the proposition submitted by the Senator from Tennessee to its logical conclusion. I want to submit this very brief suggestion to the Senate in this connection.

It seems to me that the proposal submitted by the Senator from Tennessee, while wholly unscientific, wholly a stab in the dark so far as any effort to economize is concerned, nevertheless is a type of major operation which has got to be performed if we subsequently hope to reach our objective and to cut the appropriations as our national necessity demands. But in order to perform this major operation it seems to me that we must go one step farther to implement the executive department with the necessary latitudes and power to achieve a readjustment of their reorganization to fit the reduced expenditures.

It seems to me that if we wish thus to cut appropriations arbitrarily and in effect thus transfer to the executive departments the task of accommodating the governmental machinery to these shortened funds, it certainly becomes highly important and equally necessary to provide the Executive with adequate latitudes of reorganization to fit reduced appropriations.

Mr. President, we have 200 different Federal bureaus, boards, and commissions with a total of 550,000 employees. If there is a major opportunity to reorganize economy, it lies in the prompt and efficient treatment and coordination of the efforts involved in this veritable hodgepodge of bureaus, commissions, and departments. I think the most classic example respecting the burdens not only upon the Government but upon the American people, which comes through this curious mélange of official authorities that has been raised, is indicated in the experience of the mariner who undertakes to deal with this Government, as once pointed out by President Hoover.

He must obtain his domestic charts from the Department of Commerce, his foreign charts from the Navy Department, and his nautical almanac from the Naval Observatory, and he will in some circumstances get sailing directions from the Army. In a fog he may get radio signals from both the Navy Department and the Commerce Department. He will listen to foghorns and look for lights. and buoys provided him by the Department of Commerce. If he sinks, his life is saved by the Treasury Department. He will anchor at the direction of the Army, who rely upon the Treasury to enforce their will. His boilers and lifeboats are inspected by the Department of Commerce. His crew is certificated by one bureau in Commerce, signed off in the presence of another, inspected at sailing by the Treasury and on arrival by the Department of Labor.

That is the vicissitude of the mariner dealing with this perplexing and complicated thing that we call the Government of the United States. That exhibit can be multiplied one thousand times, and it is perfectly obvious that at this particular point is the opportunity to achieve in practical net results the economy which the Senator from Tennessee proposes in his motion.

The point I am trying to make is that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee standing by itself may seem to be arbitrary and without justification; but when linked with it is the extension of a reasonable executive power within the law to reorganize, consolidate, and simplify this governmental structure, it becomes a thoroughly reasonable prospectus to think that it will be possible to cut horizontally these expenditures 10 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I inquire of the Senator whether under his amendment the authority and power are given the President to reorganize and consolidate all the departments or whether he is referring now to this particular department, the Interior Department, dealt with in the bill now before us?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, there is nothing that I can offer by way of an amendment that controverts the constitutional right of Congress to retain authority. The thing I am seeking to do is solely to permit executive power where it can be exercised to consolidate and coordinate bureaus and commissions in this and other departments of the Government where they are interrelated.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why not confine it to the one department, since we are dealing with one department at this time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will tell the Senator why it will be impossible to confine it to this department. It would be wholly impractical and nothing but shadow boxing to confine it to the one department for the following reasons:

Public-works construction at the present time is handled by 14 bureaus or agencies in 9 different departments. If we are going to have any coordination, we have to bring them all within the reach of the coordinator.

Conservation of national resources is handled in eight bureaus or agencies in five different departments, and, of course, there is a perfectly magnificent overhead included at each step in this overlapping and interlocking procedure.

Direct aids to industry are handled in five different bureaus or agencies in two different departments. Direct aids to the merchant marine are handled in 14 different bureaus or agencies in 6 different departments. Direct aids to education are handled in six different bureaus or agencies in three different departments. Public health is handled in four different bureaus or agencies in two different departments. The purchase of $250,000,000 of supplies annually is handled independently by all bureaus in all departments; and if there is to be any sensible attempt at economical coordination, it must not be confined within the limits of any one department, but must reach into the whole structure wherever the coordination needs to go in order to accomplish the results, and it must be made an executive function pursuant to the repeated recommendations of the President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I can see a great deal of logic in what the Senator has said, but I do not understand its application to the motion pending. If I have a correct understanding of the present parliamentary situation, we are about to vote upon a horizontal cut of 10 per cent. Is not that the pending

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator evidently did not hear me say that I shall offer an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to add instructions in order to cover the precise objective that I am now discussing.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is going to offer an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. President, I think that is all I care to say, except that in my judgment the experience which Congress has undergone in the last few years in attempting upon its own responsibility to reach this problem has not been at all reassuring. There is nothing in that experience which gives us any right to hope for any substantial or tangible reorganization results. The President of the United States has asked for authority to proceed so far as he may upon a project of this nature. I think that he can not be held ultimately responsible unless in the interim he has the essential authority. On that theory, believing that it makes the motion of the Senator from Tennessee absolutely justified, and on the theory that it leads ultimately in the practical direction of economy, I am submitting the following amendment to the motion submitted by the Senator from Tennessee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Michigan offers the following amendment to be added to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee:

The President is hereby authorized and empowered to consolidate bureaus, divisions, and commissions, in whole or in part, and make any related changes in administration he may deem advisable, including transfer of these functions from one department to another, or from any subdivision of a department to another subdivision, so as to perfect economies and keep expenditures within the reduced appropriations herein set out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask a parliamentary question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BORAH. If the question should be raised, or it was desired to raise the question after the return of the bill as to whether the amendment proposed general legislation, it would still be permissible to do so, would it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In fairness, I do not believe it would be. If the Senate permits the amendment to be incorporated in the motion to recommit, with instructions to the committee to report the amendment, it seems to me it would be absurd, after the committee had done exactly what the Senate instructed it to do, then to hold the action of the committee in reporting the amendment out of order.

I wish to say that in the form in which the amendment is presented I shall not raise the point of order, but I think it is unfortunate that the author of the amendment sought to justify the amendment as not being violative of the rule of the Senate when no question of that nature had been raised.

As already stated, I shall not raise the point of order, but the Senate should be advised that in the present form it may be subject to a point of order if the point should be raised at this juncture, but that in all probability it would not be so that we may vote upon the amendment submitted by the subject to a point of order if the Senate should now accept the amendment and should instruct the committee to report it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the amendment will not be subject to a point of order after the bill shall be returned to the Senate, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. My understanding is that the Senator does not undertake by his amendment to give authority to the President to abolish departments?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. But simply to consolidate them?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not even to consolidate departments, Mr. President, but bureaus, commissions, and subdivisions. I specifically omitted the word "eliminate" in order, I hoped, to meet the views of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BLAINE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLAINE. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan should carry, would an amendment be in order to add further instructions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the pending amendment shall be disposed of, then, of course, the motion will be open to further amendment, provided the proposed amendment is in order; and a vote could be had on it if no point of order were raised. It is not for the Chair to raise or suggest a

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to offer an amendment giving additional instructions to the committee. I do not want to be barred from offering that amendment. I am certain the amendment is in order under the rules if it is not precluded by action on the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not be precluded by the pending amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not care to prolong the discussion. I should like, however, to observe in connection with what has been said by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg], while it may not be relevant to this particular matter, that in the administration of the affairs of the insular possessions of the United States there is the same topsy-turvy situation. For instance, I need mention only the Philippines and suggest that that archipelago, an empire in itself, is administered entirely by the War Department. The Government of Porto Rico likewise is administered by the War Department. The government of the island of Guam is administered by the Navy Department. That is true also of American Samoa, and until very recently of the Virgin Islands; while the two organized Territories of the country, the Territory of Hawaii and the Territory of Alaska, are administered by the Interior Department. I may say also that the Panama Zone, while its government is largely conducted by a more or less independent bureau, is nevertheless, to some considerable degree, at least, administered by the War Department. So there is an overlapping of overhead charges all along the line.

Not only is that expensive, Mr. President, and not conducive in the slightest degree to economy, but it also makes for inefficiency of administration. We have an empirecall it what you may-which is scattered all over the earth. and on which, to use the British boast, the sun never sets. We have naval operations, Army operations, and mercantile operations. There can never be any efficiency in the administration of these various dependencies of ours until the Government is consolidated under one head.

I suspect that this is hardly the time to suggest it; the present moment is perhaps not opportune, but I do hope that we may find a way to have one executive department administer the affairs of all our colonial possessions and dependencies throughout the earth. That would not only make tremendously for economy but for efficiency as well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. May the proposition before us now be divided

Senator from Michigan separately from the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to add instructions to the motion offered by the Senator from Tennessee

Mr. KING. I thought they were to be voted on together. The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. KING. Is it subject to a point of order? If so, I submit a point of order against the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has given this question a good deal of consideration and finds no precedent of the Senate upon the question raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King]. The Chair, however, does find the question has been raised in the House of Representatives, and in that body it has been universally held that it is not in order to move the recommitment of a bill with instructions to report matters which would not be in order if offered as an amendment in the House.

The Chair finds that the question was raised on a proposed amendment which was not germane and the same ruling was made upon that point which had been made upon other questions. The Chair therefore holds that, as the question of germaneness has been raised on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, the question as to whether or not the amendment is germane under the rules of the Senate must be submitted to the Senate. The question now is whether the amendment is germane. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.
Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Chair has stated the question as if it were a vote on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. The question is whether or not the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan is germane.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and all those who believe that the amendment is germane will vote "yea." The question is not on the amendment itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All those who believe the amendment is germane will stand and remain standing until counted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask a question before the vote is taken? Germane to what?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is whether or not the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan would be germane if offered in the Senate as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. JONES. The amendment is not offered to the bill; it is offered to a motion pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; as an instruction to the committee to bring back the bill with the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. And what the Senate is about to vote on is not the question whether the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is germane to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee but whether it would be germane to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; as an amendment proposed on the floor of the Senate.

On a division, the Senate decided that the amendment of Mr. Vandenberg was not germane.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, I should like briefly to make an observation or two.

I think we are all agreed that we must make retrenchment in governmental expenditures. The only question is as to how it shall be done. Last evening I was reading one of the messages of Grover Cleveland, and was somewhat surprised at the small sum he mentioned as being necessary to run the Government and to provide for its expenses. He mentioned it as being a little over $350,000,000. That led me to look into the growth of the appropriations from period to period.

The figures set forth in the messages of the Presidents are probably not as accurate as the figures of the Treasury Department, but these are the figures mentioned by various Presidents in their messages:

On December 7, 1896, President Cleveland, in his last message, referred to the expenditures of the Government that year as being $434,678,000—less than half a billion dollars.

In December, 1900, in the fourth message of President Mc-Kinley, he mentioned the appropriations as being $454,-

Three years afterwards, in 1903, President Roosevelt referred to the expenditures of the Government of that year as being $506,099,000, and spoke of the amount as being somewhat exorbitant.

On December 6, 1910, President Taft referred to the expenditures of that year as being $620,494,000; and on December 6, 1912, in his last message, President Taft referred to the fact that the appropriations had reached the figure of $732,000,000.

On December 7, 1915, the year following the beginning of the World War in Europe and two years before we had entered that conflict, President Wilson referred to the annual expenditures of the Government for that year as being $753,896,000. In other words, in 1915 the appropriations aggregated three-quarters of a billion dollars. To-day the expenditures of the Government are over $4,000,000,000. I know that the $4,000,000,000 can be partially accounted for by fixed charges that are definitely due to the World War, such, for example, as the fixed charge for interest. That probably will reach between eight and nine hundred million dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not desire to controvert the Senator's statement that everybody wants to economize; but I desire to call the Senator's attention to this particular motion to see whether he wants to economize in the way this motion seeks to economize.

Mr. FESS. No; I do not think so. I think that is unscientific—very unscientific.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought, from what the Senator said, that he was for the motion.

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, while I am asking the question I will make a suggestion, anyway.

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee could obey the instructions of this motion to the very letter, and still not reduce the great bulk of the appropriations in the bill, by eliminating entirely a whole lot of the appropriations.

What is the total amount carried in the bill?

Mr. McKellar. The amount carried by the bill as passed by the House is about $50,000,000. This would reduce it to an aggregate of $45,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That would take off $5,000,000. They could strike out all of the appropriation for some bureau, and the same way with another one, until they reached the total of $5,000,000, and not touch the balance of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am asking the Senator to yield to me. Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the committee could do that; but I take it that the Appropriations Committee has never done anything to cause the Senate to believe that it would not be perfectly fair as to all items. In other words, this merely fixes the limit of a reduced total; that is all. The committee goes ahead and passes upon each item of the bill, and adjusts each item of the bill in accordance with the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, all that I had in mind was to impress the Senators with my conviction that something must be done somewhere. I think we are all agreed to that; but I think my friend from Tennessee, while he is making an honest effort to accomplish economy, is not pursuing the scientific method.

Mr. McKELLAR. How could it be more scientific? All we do is to give to the Appropriations Committee instructions to do just what it has unlimited authority to do. We still give it unlimited authority to adjust these appropriations. We merely fix the total amount, so I do not see how the motion could be fairer.

If the Senate trusted the committee to bring in a bill at all, it certainly can trust the committee to bring in a reduced total. I am quite sure the committee will be fair. I know that the other members of it will be entirely fair, and I shall try to be.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I was about to say that some of this $4,000,000,000 consists of fixed charges which we can not modify. We must meet the obligation. If our public debt is $17,000,000,000—and it will be more than that when we reach the deficit—at the rate of four and a quarter per cent the interest would run very close to $900,000,000 a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the amount of interest is about $600,000,000. Nobody in the world will propose to reduce that item 10 per cent. It could not be done.

Mr. FESS. Then there is a certain amount that is required under the sinking fund. We could modify that law if we thought it wise, but we regard that as essential; and that is a fixed charge.

Then the amount that we expend for veterans' service is evidently going a little above a billion dollars a year.

Of the $4,000,000,000, therefore, we could account for considerably more than half. Even at that rate, however, in 1915 the total was only three-quarters of a billion dollars. Now it is very close to $2,000,000,000, not to count the fixed charges that are incident to the World War.

Every effort that we make to cut any appropriation will be resisted, and probably logically so, because these additional appropriations are entailed by what we do in this body. For example, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which started out as a small body, has come to be an enormous organization, with heavy expenditures; but not a dollar of the money is expended except as we order it. We will present in the Senate, and pass within an hour's time, a resolution imposing upon the Interstate Commerce Commission duties that will involve hundreds of thousands of dollars of additional expenditure; and we do it without ever thinking about the source of the expenditure that we are requiring here.

I have noticed it right along. Some Senator will introduce a resolution requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to do a certain thing. At one time we passed here without debate, by unanimous consent, a certain resolution; and the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission notified me that it would take every employee they had for the full period of six months to do the work we had authorized down here without a single word of debate. We have been doing that sort of thing too much.

Take the Federal Trade Commission. I am receiving letter after letter to-day protesting against cutting the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission as has been proposed, on the ground that if we do we shall be vitiating the investigations we have already authorized. The authorization is made without reference to whether or not it is going to increase the expenditures. We do it indifferently, because we think it ought to be done. We never count the cost. As the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis] said the other day, here is an authorization to undertake work that the author of the bill stated would not cost over $2,000,000. and could be finished within two or three years. That was 20 years ago. It has cost over $100,000,000 up to the present time, both to the railroads and to the Government, and it is not finished yet; and the trouble is that when the work is finished it will be out of date and will have to be done over again.

That is the situation that we permit, as responsible legislators; and then we complain about the enormous expenditures. We do it because we think it ought to be done. The Federal Trade Commission's functions are increasing rapidly. A great many people think we do not need it. I do not agree with that view, but a halt of these heavy expenditures must be made somewhere.

Take the Shipping Board. I have been looking over the expenditures of that body. I have been running through the list of the commissions that have been created in the last 20 years, small when started, but very large in their exactions in the way of appropriations to-day. The moment we make a move to cut anything out of any one of them, we have repercussions that come from all over the country: "Do not do this. You are crippling the very thing you have authorized to be done"; and it seems to me that it becomes almost impossible for us to do what we want to do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it becomes impossible when Senators take the attitude that the Senator from Ohio is taking now. He says that these cuts ought to be made; he thinks that they are proper, but he is going to vote against the proposal.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am not taking an inconsistent position on that subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. FESS. What I insist upon is that we are not going to get substantial reductions as we are now proceeding. We must make an effort, through a proper organization, to eliminate these excrescent accretions that we can dispense with. We will not be able to do that in a body like this, because there are too many angles of influence that come here. We must grant authority somewhere—either this body has to do it or else it has to give it to the Executive—to use the knife in spite of the influence that might come through the friends of this bureau or that bureau.

President Taft undertook that task in his efficiency effort. He did not get anywhere. Then President Wilson undertook it when we passed the Overman Act, giving him certain authority. That was largely a war measure. He could not do much because we were then in the midst of a necessity of increasing rather than decreasing, and what was done because of the stress of war can not be criticized. Then President Harding responded to a demand in both Houses and created this commission on reconstruction, consisting of so many Members of the House and so many Members of the Senate, and requested authority to appoint a representative of the Executive to act as a sort of an executive head of the commission. For months and months that commission worked assiduously and gathered an enormous amount of data; and they found that with scarcely a single exception—I think one exception—they received very little cooperation from the executive departments that they were appointed to reorganize. These things show that when we undertake to infringe in any way on the expenditures of any department it has to be done by a major operation, with little regard for the wishes of the people who are identified with the department.

My thought was that either Congress or the President should be authorized to establish some set-up by which this whole matter can be reorganized. On that basis we can entirely eliminate things that I would not want to vote to eliminate here without a study.

There is the weakness of the proposal of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar]. He comes in and says, "We want to economize; therefore let us cut off so much from every item that comes in. Let us deal with it in that way." We will never get anywhere in that way. My friend knows that we will not. We can not get anywhere with that process.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President, the Senator says the Senator from Tennessee knows that we can not do that. I have served now for 8 or 10 years—I do not remember exactly how long—on the Appropriations Committee. I have made it a study. I say to the Senator that this department will get along just as well with $45,000,000 as it will get along with $50,000,000. It is perfectly proper to fix such a limit.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if I made the statement that the Senator from Tennessee knows that can not be done, I wish to withdraw it. I did not mean to say that. I might have said I think the Senator knows it; but I do not want to make the statement that the Senator knows that what he is doing will be without effect, and so on. I did not mean that at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator can make the statement or not, just as he likes, but this is the fact: We can save from five to ten million dollars in this one bill, and if the Senator wants to save it he will vote for the amendment. If he does not want to save it, if he wants these extravagant appropriations continued, he can vote against it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I shall vote against this amendment because it is not the method by which to reduce expenses and, at the same time, preserve the efficiency of the Government. We want to expend whatever money is necessary to assure efficient public service. But wherever we can cut out expenditures and avoid useless expenditures I am ready to vote for a measure to accomplish that purpose. But I do not want it to be haphazard. I want a study made of the matter by those who will go into the details and bring some constructive measure before us so that we may act upon the whole thing as a unit.

To-day I am receiving letters complaining because we are going to balance the Budget. The fact is that there is not a Senator in the Chamber who is not receiving protests, on the one hand, because we are cutting off expenditures, and protests on the other hand because we vote for the expenditure of money, which will have to be raised by taxation, to make possible expenditures that are being demanded. It is an impossible situation, and it seems to me that the atmosphere in the Senate and the House has never been so conducive as it is to-day to a suggestion that we proceed logically, and do what all of us want to do. But this is not the way to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I dislike to delay a vote, but it seems to me, from what has been said, that something else ought to be said. I am satisfied there is not a Member of the Senate or of the House who is not anxious to economize. There are difficulties in the way of bringing about economies in an efficient and logical manner.

A large proportion of the expenses of our Government are fixed charges which can be definitely and accurately and properly charged up to our participation in the war. I am not going to assume the attitude of one who says "I told you so," but, as a matter of fact, I think I am the only one in this body to-day who voted against the declaration of war, and from that war have come the enormous expenses which are fixed definitely.

Nobody for a moment can think of such a thing as cutting off the necessary appropriations for paying interest on the debts we owe, and for paying pensions and compensation which go to the soldiers. I do not know how we can reduce those expenses. They will probably be increased, properly increased, to some extent. But we hired the fiddler, and now let us pay him according to contract.

I think that if it were known over the civilized world that every time a country rushed into war when it ought to stay out, eventually the burdens of taxation were going to come down upon the people and upon their posterity, almost to the end of time, they would hesitate in taking the step more than they have in the past.

Many of these appropriations which are necessary for running this Government are in the support of commissions and bureaus which have been established to protect the ordinary citizen against the encroachment of monopolies and trusts. Some say, "Abolish the Federal Trade Commission." We could do so. We could abolish the Department of Agriculture, we could abolish the Department of the Interior almost entirely, we could abolish the Interior almost entirely.

Commerce Commission, we could abolish the Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor, we could take half of the expenses away from the Department of State, we could combine the Department of War and the Navy Department, as we ought to do, and put them in one department. But when Senators and others are advocating the abolishment, for instance, of the Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission let us see why we set up those organizations. Let us see what the object of the Federal Trade Commission was, for instance.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator does not refer to

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no. In fact, I may say that I am in hearty accord with practically everything the Senator said.
Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator does not refer to me, does he?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not refer to anyone. I give everybody a clean bill of health.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does refer to a speech made on this floor, however, and I think it is appropriate to answer it precisely as it is being answered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, at the beginning of this session of Congress we were called upon to do various things, and there was great propaganda, emanating from the White House and going all over the country, to the effect that unless we did so-and-so in such-and-such a length of time we were about to go on the rocks and the whole world was about to sink into oblivion. We rushed over each other to carry out the mandates which came.

First, there was the moratorium. We made it necessary, when we passed that legislation, to tax our people for the coming year $250,000,000, which would not have been necessary if we had not extended the foreign-debt payments.

Then we pledged the Reconstruction Finance Corporation $2,000,000,000. The people talking about economy were not economists then. There came over the radio speeches from men connected with the National Chamber of Commerce, which, as a matter of fact, is only an aggregation of millionaires and billionaires, telling the common people what they ought to do in running their Government. They said, "It will not cost much. It will not be much for each individual. It is necessary. We must have this money for the railroads, for the banks, for the great corporations." They got that.

Then came the next bill, running up into the hundreds of millions, authorizing the appropriation of more money, to go mostly to banks and other corporations, which, it was claimed, had frozen assets. That was not extravagance. That was all right. Big business wanted it, corporations wanted it, monopolies wanted it, and we were patriots as long as we were doing that.

The moment they got theirs then came down the hard hand, saying, "Look out. You can not sustain these bureaus. You must abolish the Federal Trade Commission, you must abolish the machinery which regulates the railroads, you must abolish the machinery which stands between the little man and the monopolistic organizations. You can not afford to pay it any longer. It is too much taxation. It is extravagance."

Mr. President, we are face to face with what was known when we went into the moratorium proposition, when we turned over $2,000,000,000 to the new corporation, setting up a new institution. We knew then that the money had to come from taxation, and yet we acted with a willing hand and obediently, following the dictates of big business, everybody afraid of it, and yet everybody for it.

Cut out the Federal Trade Commission and thus bring joy and hilarity to the Power Trust. The Federal Trade Commission has been making an investigation which has disclosed almost criminal tactics which have been indulged in from year to year by this, the greatest of all monopolies in the United States. Stop it. The taxpayer can not afford it, and the Power Trust does not want it and does not need it. Cut it out.

mission." We could do so. We could abolish the Department of Agriculture, we could abolish the Department of the Interior almost entirely, we could abolish the Interstate the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission between ment of Government is cut.

We will soon come to the Army and the Navy, and it will be said, "We want to build more warships, we want more guns. we want a bigger army." They will forget all about the taxpayer then. But ask for a little money to put the farmer on his feet and to help stricken agriculture, which, after all, is the basis of every permanent prosperity we ever had or ever will have, and the cry will go up at once, "Do not put the Government into business. Do not increase taxation."

After all, Mr. President, I do not feel so bad even if we have to issue bonds temporarily. The cry goes out, "Balance the Budget." There was no demand that we balance the Budget when we were appropriating $2,000,000,000 for big business. We did not care about balancing the Budget when we passed the moratorium legislation. But now we want to balance the Budget. I think we ought to balance the Budget if we can. I realize that we ought to operate our Government on a business basis. But when we went into the World War nobody said to balance the Budget with taxation, and we are confronted now with an emergency two-thirds of which comes from the World War, a depression which nobody believes is going to last always. It is does, our Government, with the remainder of the governments on the face of the earth, is going into the hands of receivers as a bankrupt. So I like to think that there is a brighter day ahead, that the depression will not always last. Rather than cripple some of the necessary functions of government, I would rather issue bonds than to abolish some of the things which I believe are necessary if we are to protect our people from the inroads of monopolies, corporations, and trusts.

Now is a poor time, it seems to me, after we have been so lavish with public funds, after we have donated $250,-000,000 to our foreign creditors, to say that now we will kill, for instance, the Federal Trade Commission and thus end at once the investigation they have been making for several years, which shows the most outrageous high-handed finance, which would make a Capone, or anybody like him, blush with envy; when those investigations are being made, when we are going to find out what monopoly and trust has been heaping down upon the consumers of the United States, shall we stop because it costs something?

If it is impossible to go on without the issuing of bonds, we will have to issue bonds, and then when we get on our feet again and refer to this history we are making to-day, when somebody in Europe says, "Get your boys and send them over here to fight our battles," we will not do it. We will keep them at home. When some big corporation is to be organized to help railroads and big corporations, we will refuse to pay the money out of the Treasury of the United States to do it. We have commenced at the wrong end. We ought to have commenced at the bottom. If we had made agriculture and labor prosperous, we would have restored the buying power of millions and millions of our people who now are unable to buy even the necessaries of life.

Understand, Mr. President, I am not crying out against economy. I believe there are a lot of useless divisions and bureaus in our Government. I would like to combine them. I think we could improve our departments headed by Cabinet officers by eliminating possibly one-half of them. Many of the bureaus could be eliminated. There is no reason why the very department we are now discussing, the Department of the Interior, should not be consolidated with the Department of Agriculture. Their duties and their work overlap almost the entire length of both departments. I am in favor of doing anything of that kind. I would like to assist in doing something of the kind. But I am not willing to say that in the name of economy we are going to cut off the heads of some of the officials who are to-day standing between the common people of America and the trusts and combinations which are trying to get additional advantage of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, of course, the Senator from Nebraska does not direct his remarks at me, because 30 and 40 per cent, more than those for any other depart- I did not vote for the moratorium. I did not vote for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, and I do not think I have ever voted for any extraordinary appropriation of any sort unless it was for some large appropriation to relieve the starving people of the country. I think that is the only time I did such a thing, and being the author of the motion I take it that the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska do not apply to me.

I want to address myself for a moment to a reply to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Fess]. He said this is an arbitrary method of dealing with the matter. It is no arbitrary method at all. It is quite the contrary. The total appropriation proposed is $50,000,000, in round numbers. We will reduce it, if my motion is agreed to, by $5,000,000, or to $45,000,000. The differences will go to conference between the two Houses and be ironed out. We do not know what the net result will be. I imagine it will be somewhere between the figures of the Senate, if my motion should carry, and the figures of the House. It will have to be between those figures. That is the way it ought to be. But first the bill will go back to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee will do precisely as it has done already-go over each item of the bill, arrange those items to suit the committee, and report back a bill, but with the total appropriation of $45,000,000 or thereabouts.

Surely that can be done. The Senator from Ohio has served on that committee, as I have served on it, for years. He knows it would not be a difficult matter for the committee to get together and revise some of the items. Some of them might be raised a little, but the total level could be reduced to $45,000,000. I want to say to the Senate and to the country that in my judgment the Department of the Interior would be as economically and as efficiently operated on $45,000,000 as on $50,000,000. That would be especially true if the head of the department was given the power and authority to consolidate bureaus and divisions within the department.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] wants us to go further than that and apply it to every department. That might come later, as it seems to me. I did not vote either way on his proposal, because it did not seem to me to be germane and again it seemed to me to cover too much territory. I would be delighted to vote to give the President or the head of the department the right to consolidate bureaus and divisions within the department or to wipe out bureaus and divisions if there were found to be duplicating activities. I do not believe there would be a point of order raised against an amendment which would give to the President or to the Secretary of the Interior the right to consolidate bureaus or to abolish bureaus or divisions.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think that if the Senator will lead in an effort to have a reorganization, either by the Congress or by the Executive, he will get what he wants. This is the best time that has ever come to us to do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. We will never get a reduction in appropriations unless the Senate and the House make such a reduction. We gave the President authority some years ago. and there are many legal lights in the country who believe that the President to-day has the power without it being given to him again; that he has the power to consolidate bureaus, to abolish bureaus or divisions in any department he wants to. I am rather inclined to the view that he has

However that may be, I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that if my motion is adopted here to-day he will see that it will be the beginning of a limitation on each department of the Government that will work out a saving of something like $250,000,000 or $300,000,000 per annum. I believe that every Senator feels in his own mind and heart that the Government could be run just as efficiently on $300,000,000 less as it could be run on the $4,601,000,000 which has been recommended by the President.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further? Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Former Senator Aldrich made the statement some years ago that if he had the authority he could save $300,000,000, and only recently a very distinguished business man said it would be very easy to-day to save $300,000,000, but it will never be done in this way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why will it not be done? We all think it ought to be done, and the only reason why we will not do it this way is because of the constant appealing of bureau chiefs and bureaucrats. Senators are afraid to vote against them. My distinguished friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Moses], now in the chair, shakes his head. I know he is not afraid. I did not mean to say he is.

I want to say that, in my judgment, the entire country would welcome this proposal if it went through. If the country believes that the Congress is going to cut down this vast sum by $250,000,000 or $300,000,000, it would make them feel better and it would make business better. It would make our return to normalcy a great deal easier if it were done. But instead of doing that we have been most extravagant, though when I say "we" I do not include myself, because the only extravagant bill I voted for so far, as I can now recall, failed to get the approval of this body. I do not think I am responsible for this extravagance.

Mr. President, I hope the motion will be agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the motion in the form of an additional instruction. At the end of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee I move to strike out the period and insert a comma, and then insert the language which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the motion submitted by the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Wisconsin moves to add the following:

Except such reduction shall not apply to any item in the act providing for food, clothing, medicine, medical care, hospitals, sanatoria, schools, or any other institution providing for the health and education of Indians, or to any hospital for the insane or institution for the deaf provided for in this act, or for the care, custody, and treatment or burial of the insane provided for in this act.

Mr. McKELLAR. That excepts the entire bill, does it not, and all of the activities provided for in the bill? Were any omitted by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I proceed upon the assumption that the Senator from Tennessee understands that there are 350,000 Indians in the country, as stated on the floor the other day. I may be mistaken as to the number. The Indians are a subjugated and dependent race. The items excepted by my proposed amendment refer to the food and clothing, medicine, medical care, hospital, sanatoria, schools, and other institutions intended to promote the health and education of Indians. That is one provision.

Mr. President, desperate as the situation may be in this country, I hope there is no one who is so sordid or so selfish that they would deprive the children of these dependent Indians, this subjugated race, of these needful things. I want the Senator from Tennessee to understand that they are our neighbors and we are their neighbors. We must live with them and among them. Out of a mere suggestion of humanity we ought not to reduce the appropriation for the purpose of furnishing the essential food, clothing, medical care, and schooling for those Indians.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield in just a moment.

True, they are of a different race than are we. They are of a different environment. But I say, Mr. President, that we can not out of consideration for our own race neglect these wards of the Government. The bill now before us includes the treatment of Indians suffering from tuberculosis, blindness, communicable diseases, transmittible diseases. Why, Mr. President, for our own protection, for the protection of our own race, we ought at least to guard ourselves by providing for the humanitarian care of this dependent race.

Moreover, Mr. President, covered by the provisions in the bill is St. Elizabeths Hospital, established here in the District of Columbia.

I call attention to the fact that this institution is a hospital for the insane and cares for insane persons from the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard; insane inmates of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers; among others those who have become insane since their entry into the military or naval service of the United States; insane civilians in the Quartermaster Service of the United States; insane persons transferred from the Canal Zone who have been admitted to the hospital and who are indigent; American citizens legally adjudged insane in the Dominion of Canada whose legal residence in one of the States, Territories, or in the District of Columbia it has been impossible to establish; insane beneficiaries under the United States Employees' Compensation Commission; and insane beneficiaries of the United States Veterans' Bureau. This institution treats the soldiers of the past wars; it is treating those to whom the Government is paying compensation and who may be insane.

Moreover, Mr President, this bill provides for the Freedmen's Hospital, an institution for the treatment and care of men and women who are ill and in need of medical and surgical attention. This bill provides also for the treatment and care and custody of men and women adjudged insane in the far-off frozen regions of Alaska, and for their burial.

Mr. President, it ought to be appreciated when it comes to cutting 10 per cent off the aggregate of these appropriations that these dependents, these Indian children, these insane people, the sick are going to have no voice, but the influential officials in the departments will always see to it that there is no cut in those items which have to do with their salaries. If the motion of the Senator from Tennessee shall be adopted and the committee carries out the instructions, when the cut comes it will be made in the items for the care, clothing, food, medical attention, treatment of the insane, and the support of the Indian schools and other activities and hospitals and institutions for the care of dependents. The department or bureau will see to that when they spend the funds.

So, Mr. President, out of a sentiment of humanity and for our own protection there ought not to be given any direction to the Appropriations Committee to cut these items specified in the additional instructions contained in the amendment to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to say that the people of this country are not going to take kindly to any program of economy at the expense of the unfortunate wards of our Government and the unfortunate men and women who may be placed in institutions for the treatment of the insane.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just a word. In regard to the Indians, I think everyone in this body knows the fight that has been going on in their behalf during this entire week. Of the Committee on Appropriations the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] is chairman, and his kindness toward and consideration and care for the Indians is known of all men. The feeling of the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], who is also on that committee, is of the same kind. In my judgment, every member of the committee has the kindest and most sympathetic interest in the Indians. I can assure the Senator from Wisconsin that, whether his amendment shall be adopted or not, there will be no injury come to the Indians at the hands of the committee in connection with this bill or any other bill, because I have never seen anything but the most earnest desire to care for and protect the interests of those wards of our Nation.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLAINE. Is there anything in the Senator's motion that gives us such a guaranty?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not necessary. The record of the Appropriations Committee is an absolute guaranty that the Indians' rights and interests are not going to be jeopardized.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Blaine] to the fact over 40 per cent of the amount carried in this bill is for the direct care of the Indians. While I am on my feet I will say this

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Utah does not mean to say that 40 per cent of the appropriation is for the food, clothing, medical care, hospitals, sanitariums, schools, and other institutions intended for the purpose of promoting the health and education of the Indians?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call attention here to the fact that the amount recommended in the bill for education alone is $10,578,000. For hospitals alone there is an appropriation carried in the bill of $3,594,800.

Mr. BLAINE. That includes capital account for construction, does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. There is very little construction work provided for.

Mr. BLAINE. The instruction I propose has to do only with maintenance respecting the specific items mentioned.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not speaking against the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. I was thinking, though, that when we cut 10 per cent from the appropriations carried by the bill, a great part of the reduction will have to come by decreasing the number of employees. I can imagine just what will then happen. John Jones, of Georgia, would be dismissed and Mary Smith, of Florida, would be dismissed, and so it would go, affecting employees from the various States. All of them would appeal to their Senators and Representatives in Congress; they would get up petitions at home; they would bombard their Senators and Representatives with such petitions; they would call attention to the fact that the great Government of the United States was driving them to hunger, to sorrow, and perhaps to death. The Senators thus appealed to, no doubt, would go to see the "tyrant" Secretary of the Interior and inquire, "Why did you discharge this employee; you know that such dismissals have a great effect upon me at home; the people at home are talking against it; they are objecting to these discharges," and the employee who was dismissed would say, "I have been in the Government service for so many years and now because of an act of Congress I am to be discharged and thrown out upon the street; somebody has got to do something about it."

Mr. President, I hardly need say anything more. If a 10 per cent reduction is to be made in the appropriations, I can imagine one place where $2,500,000 could be eliminated.

Mr. TYDINGS. Where?

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to an item that has been put in the bill not for expenditure this year but which ultimately will have to be expended, and that is the item affecting roads and trails in the forest reserves. That item has been recommended, although it is not to be expended this year, but in the program for the building of those roads the contracts will have to be let, and those contracts can not be let without the department knowing at least whether they will have the money with which to pay for the work. So perhaps that item could come out; but when we touch the other items in the bill I do not know what will happen. If the motion should be agreed to, we will do the best we can; but I do not see how in the world we are going to comply with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the motion offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have consulted Senators, and I wish to offer my amendment in a different form, which I think is generally satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee it is proposed to add the following:

And with further instructions to include a section reading as follows:

"The President is hereby authorized and empowered to consolidate bureaus, divisions, and commissions, in whole or in part, and make any related changes in administration he may deem advisable so as to effect economies and keep expenditures within the reduced appropriations herein set out."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to that amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while we are discussing economy, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a speech made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Ship-STEAD] on the subject of our Treasury deficit and suggested remedies. It seems to me to be very appropriate at this time, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The speech referred to is as follows:

"OUR TREASURY DEFICIT—SUGGESTED REMEDIES"

(Speech of Hon. Henrik Shipstead, United States Senator from Minnesota, in the National Radio Forum, arranged by the Wash-ington Star and broadcast over a coast-to-coast network of the National Broadcasting Co., Monday night, March 7, 1932)

The United States Treasury, it is predicted, will be short in the neighborhood of $2,000,000,000 at the end of June 30, 1932. For a long period of years up until 1930 the Government Treasury had a surplus of income over expenditures. The question is naturally raised as to why this great deficit came so suddenly within the last two years.

We must remember that the Treasury of the United States does bt make money. It collects money in the form of taxes from the not make money. people. The main source of income to the Federal Government comes in the form of income taxes and duties on imports. When the great mass of people have incomes sufficiently large so that they pay income taxes to the Government, and when foreign commerce in the form of imports is prospering, revenues to the Treasury increase. When the great mass of the income-tax paying individuals and corporations are prosperous income-tax receipts increase. When foreign and domestic commerce is prosperous there is always sufficient revenue to fill the Treasury, and when these activities are not prosperous Government income declines. The main reason for the lack of income to the Treasury is the fact that incomes of American citizens and corporations and foreign commerce have suffered a great decline in the last two years. Generally speaking, it may be said that the Government has lost its income because the American people have lost their income. If we can come to an understanding of how the American people have had their incomes reduced, we will then know why the Government income have hear reduced, we will then know why the Government income have hear reduced.

I will this evening give you some of my views as to why I believe these incomes have declined. After having done so I will, with your indulgence, give you some views that I have as to how incomes, both to the American people in general and the Government can be restored. can be restored.

I believe the American people's, and therefore the Government's, income has declined because we have pursued policies, public and private, that have destroyed incomes. These policies have brought private, that have destroyed incomes. These policies have brought on what we call the depression. In this 20-minute address there is not time for me to enumerate in detail and explain the effect of all of these policies, but I will point out some of them.

The first, I would say, are policies that have resulted in a very unjust distribution of national income. As, for instance, from 1924 to 1930 agriculture lost 40 per cent of its income; labor in the manufacturing industries in the aggregate in the United States lost 30 per cent of its income, while industries had an income. lost 30 per cent of its income, while industry had an increase in income, as reflected in increased common-stock dividends, of 72 per cent. The loss of 40 per cent of income to agriculture and 30 per cent to labor affected the purchasing power of 70,000,000 people dependent upon agriculture and wages for income. We permitted industry to receive so much of the national income at the expense of agriculture and labor that by destroying their purchasing power of agriculture and labor that by destroying their purchasing of agriculture and labor that by destroying their purchasing power industry's income has also to a large extent been destroyed. Twenty-five per cent of our population is dependent upon agriculture, and these 25 per cent receive only 10 per cent of the national income. As a result of this inequitable distribution of income we had a dangerous concentration of wealth into the hands of the few. For instance, in 1929, 504 persons in the United States had a combined income of $1,185,000,000, and out of this income these 504 persons could have bought all the cotton and all the wheat

few. For instance, in 1929, 504 persons in the United States had a combined income of $1,185,000,000, and out of this income these 504 persons could have bought all the cotton and all the wheat raised in the United States in 1930.

I do not believe that the Government is solely to blame for this unjust distribution of national income and concentration of wealth, but I believe the Government is responsible for the high freight rates that the farmer must pay. Every raise in freight rates since 1920 has been an increased tax upon the income of the farmer. The Government fixes the rates. The inequalities of the tariff which compel the farmer to sell at a cheap price and buy at a high price because the farmer is an exporter is another attack upon his income for the benefit of industry. High interest rates and the unstable value of the dollar has been another attack upon his income in recent years, because it compels him to pay his taxes and the interest on his debts in a dollar 50 per cent dearer than it was five years ago. As a result of these policies the farmer was losing money even during our years of so-called "prosperity" from 1923 to 1930. These attacks upon his income for the benefit of industry have been made largely through policies of the Government and have destroyed his purchasing power.

The purchasing power of the great mass of the people has also been destroyed by bankers underwriting and peddling to the people under high-pressure salesmanship $17,000,000,000 of foreign stocks and bonds, and from 1920 to 1930 they also underwrote and peddled out $70,000,000,000 of American stocks and bonds. We have heard a great deal about the foreign bonds but very little about the fact that four times more of new American bonds and stocks were sold here. These American bonds and stocks were issued against an already overcapitalized capital structure. These $70,000,000,000 in new stocks and bonds were additional mortgages against the future income of the people. Twenty-six billion dollars' worth of them, industrial mass of the people this increase of income to industry could not be maintained, and to the extent that interest and dividends on this huge new capital can not be paid, to that extent savings have been dissipated and purchasing power further destroyed.

Capital at the present time seems to believe that it can collect income on its fictitious capitalization by a continued attack on the income of the people by a sales tax, further deflation of farm prices, and reduction of wages. This means a reduction in the American standard of living. The high standard of living of the people of the United States did not bring on this depression. It was brought on rather by a fictitious standard of finance and unsound economic policies. When these are corrected, as they can be, the American people can still maintain their American standards.

Consolidations of industry, transportation, and finance that have been permitted by the Government have not been in the interests of efficiency and reduced cost of production. They have been rather banking consolidations for the purpose of selling more stocks and bonds and to establish monopolies and monopolistic prices. These corporations are created by the state. In earlier years their powers were guardedly given by the state. The powers they should exercise and the restrictions they should observe were stated in the acts conferring the chartering powers. The laws have been changed at the behest of the persons asking for charters, or the courts have been negligent in enforcing restrictive provisions. the courts have been negligent in enforcing restrictive provisions. Disregard of the restrictions as to soundness of capital and limitation of earnings is one of the largest factors in bringing on the presof earnings is one of the largest factors in bringing on the present depression. Again and again we have read of the stock dividend, which is the turning of excess earnings into capital stock. These become fictitious mortgages with which to further attack the income of the people. Justice requires that the people shall be protected against these creatures of the state who have put false values into their capitalization through consolidations, stock dividends, and flotation of new capital issues. The corporation is a creature of the state, and has no rights outside those given it by the state. It must be restricted at the time of its creation and regulated and controlled through its life. They have become more powerful than their creator, and if permitted to increase and keep their influence and power will destroy the government that created them.

For instance, the price of steel rails is an index of the principal steel products. The price of rails from 1901 to 1915 was $23 a steel products. The price of rails from 1901 to 1915 was $28 a ton. In 1918 it reached the price of $54 a ton, and from 1928 to 1931 the price was $45 a ton. The average price for 30 years was $35 a ton. I am advised from what I consider the best source of information on the subject that if the steel industry would be satisfied with a fair return on an honest capitalization steel can be placed upon the market and sold for $20 a ton.

If the steel and many other industries would be satisfied with a fair return on an honest capitalization, the railroads, farmers, and other users of their products would be in a much better condition than they are now

The need for new laws relating to corporations doing business in industry and commerce, and for the control of the corporations, at least so far as capital issues and consolidations are concerned, by the Government is urgent. Such control will give greater confidence in corporate investments, distribute excessive earnings in wages, give stability to industry, as well as work out the purposes of justice and honest dealing in the business world.

The inevitable stagnation of commerce resulting from the in-compatible policies of exporting capital to finance competition and at the same time increasing tariffs has increased unemployment and decreased purchasing power.

As a result of these policies, aided by an unwise policy of credit inflation, we drifted into the inevitable collapse and the depression. As a result we have vast armies of unemployed labor. We have default in debts, public and private, paralysis of our credit system, increase in the value of money, and the depression grows in intensity and force. in intensity and force.

It is not true that our troubles are due to the mistakes of Europe. The depression started here and increased in force for five months before it hit Europe.

Now the question that arises is how best to overcome the depression that arises is how best to overcome the depression. sion, restore prosperity, and balance the Budget? Many honest people would have us believe that the best way to balance the Budget is to raise taxes and reduce expenditures of the Government. Reduction of expenditures is always commendable, but you must remember that most of the Federal Government expenditures must remember that most of the Federal Government expenditures are fixed charges to pay for our part in the World War and past wars. In fact, more than 75 cents out of every dollar that is paid the United States Government in taxes goes to pay the interest and sinking fund on the war debt, the interest on that part of the debt that we canceled to foreign governments, and other fixed charges incidental to the war, and to maintain the Army and the Navy. The 1-year moratorium on debts due from foreign governments not already canceled will cost us $250,000,000 additional this year. That increases our Budget another 5 per cent. Out of the remaining 25 increases our Budget another 5 per cent. Out of the remaining 25 cents is paid all the other activities of the Government, such as the expenses of the departments of the Government, such as the expenses of the departments of the Government—executive, legislative, and judicial. Time does not permit me this evening to enumerate the expenditures here, and Congress is now making a very sincere effort to reduce expenditures wherever possible.

I have pointed these few items out to you to show you how difficult it is to make any material reduction in Government expenditures because 75 per cent of them are fixed charges due to penditures, because 75 per cent of them are fixed charges, due to war, and must be paid. This is something the people should think of before we go to war. War expenses call for payment.

of before we go to war. War expenses call for payment.

The question is to what extent can we balance the Budget by raising taxes? The question is also raised, Who shall be taxed? It is now proposed to raise income by a sales tax on goods manufactured for general consumption. This is another attack on the income of the great mass of the people whose income is already reduced. The large incomes are usually enjoyed by corporations and individuals having special favors and protection of the Government; therefore, out of that income they should pay most of the taxes. We must raise their income tax now, but because incomes on corporations are greatly reduced, I fear the income from this source of taxation will prove disappointing. But suppose we are able to balance the Budget by this form of taxation and reduction of all possible expenditures but continue the policies that caused the deficit. The deficit will be growing, and likely will be greater next year. What are we then going to do? Again raise taxation and again cut expenditures?

In my opinion, the only way to permanently balance the National Budget is to restore the income and purchasing power of the great mass of the people. When you restore the purchasing power of the 70,000,000 working for wages and dependent on the farm for income, you restore the income of everybody else in the country, including that of the Government.

farm for income, you restore the income of everybody else in the country, including that of the Government.

During this winter we have passed several legislative measures tapping the Federal Treasury for the purpose of helping the rail-roads, the banks, and the life-insurance companies, in the hope that this would relieve the credit paralysis and make it possible to inflate the credit system. I hope these pieces of legislation may prove beneficial, but I fear they will prove disappointing, because to restore prosperity by inflation of credit means to restore prosperity by increasing indebtedness. I do not believe we can borrow our-selves out of debt or out of the depression. Inflation of credits increases debts and overhead charges. A reasonable inflation of the currency will make it possible to pay debts, as was done in France and Italy and is being done in England now. If this is not done, we will very likely have most of the debts, such as stocks, bonds, and mortgages, liquidated in the bankruptcy courts, which means chaos. However, if we do inflate the currency to a reasonable extent, and so make it possible to pay debts, the relief will be temporary only, unless we change our economic policies.

I do not believe we can restore prosperity by taking money out of the Federal Treasury for the banks and the railroads. You of the Federal Treasury for the banks and the railroads. You can not restore prosperity from the top. Shakespeare's mercy "flowed gently from heaven," but I do not believe you can fill the Treasury in that way nor make prosperity flow to the people in the same way from the Treasury of the United States. The safety of the banks, the prosperity of the railroads and corporations depend, in the last analysis, upon the prosperity and purchasing power of the 70,000,000 people on the farms and working for wages. Until they are prosperous, industry, transportation, and commerce can not be prosperous. Compel corporations by taxation to distribute their exorbitant earnings in the form of wages and to distribute their exorbitant earnings in the form of wages and lower cost to consumers to create purchasing power to buy the products of industry and thus increase employment.

We must restrict our corporations in their consolidations and capital issues. Complete the inland waterways authorized by Congress. Stop the wasteful piecemeal work in their development. I am informed by traffic experts that when completed and used to full capacity $600,000,000 a year can be saved in transportation charges. Develop the St. Lawrence waterway to the sea. Drive the banks out of the stock and bond racket and compel them to return to a legitimate banking business. Take off from the backs of the farmer the economic burdens placed there by the Government and industry. We must reduce the interest charges on farm mortgages. Begin to understand that agriculture is the foundation of the Nation's economic life. All our magnificent cities stand upon the backs of the farmer and the laborer. If they are crushed, our cities will crumble. Prosperity can not return unless their income is restored.

Hoarding, bankruptcies, unemployment, bank failures, and the Treasury deficit are not the causes of the depression. These are merely the symptoms of a diseased economic condition resulting from mistaken policies of Government and individuals. To treat the symptoms merely is like giving a blood transfusion to a man with a chronic infection without removing the source of the disease; such remedies can be temporary only.

The Government can not restore prosperity by giving from the Treasury money raised by taxes. The Government can, however, to a very large extent, restore prosperity and a balanced Budget by pursuing policies that will remove the evils that I have outlined, and by initiating new policies that will foster rather than destroy agriculture and commerce, employ labor and thus restore income, and therefore purchasing power for the great mass of the people. I have mentioned some of these policies to you this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Did the Chair understand that the author of the motion accepted the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as I am able to do so, I am perfectly willing to accept it.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Tennessee is in perfect control of his motion, Mr. President, and if he accepts the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan it becomes a part of the motion, and a complete question is presented.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment, so far as I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee modifies his motion as indicated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desired a few moments ago to offer an amendment to the bill before the motion was made by the Senator from Tennessee. I did not do so because of the absence of the Senator from Montana. After action on the motion offered by the Senator from Tennessee, will I be debarred from offering the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the Senator would be debarred.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the bill has been read a third time; and I think, unless the Senator from Utah obtains unanimous consent to recur to a previous stage, that he could not offer his amendment.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Michigan to permit me to offer my amendment. There will be no discussion, and it will take only a moment.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Utah must go further than that. It will be necessary to go back of the vote whereby the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

Mr. KING. I did not know that that had been done.

Mr. MOSES. The amendments have been ordered to be engrossed and the bill has been read a third time, and the pending question prior to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee was, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. KING. I shall ask unanimous consent to offer the

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the modified motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may the motion of the Senator from Tennessee be reported as perfected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the motion as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back to the Senate with amendments providing an aggregate reduction of 10 per cent in the amount of the appropriations contained in the bill as received from the House of Representatives, and with further instructions to include a section reading as follows:

The President is hereby authorized and empowered to consolidate bureaus, divisions, and commissions, in whole or in part, and make any related changes in administration he may deem advisable, so as to effect economies and keep expenditures within the reduced appropriations herein set out.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, would it be appropriate and in order to amend the motion by striking out the words "The President" and inserting in lieu thereof "legislation looking to the consolidation of bureaus, commissions," and so forth?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is an amendment in the second degree, and would be in order.

Mr. TYDINGS. I offer that amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I inquire if it is possible to vote upon the two sections of the motion separately?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can ask for a division.

Mr. BLACK. I ask that the motion be divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will first state the amendment offered by the Senator—

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, may I say, in support of the amendment I have just offered, that I do not think the committee should be bound to any particular language. It is the idea that the Senator wants incorporated in the bill, and the committee should consider different ways of accomplishing the purpose. The Senator has in mind providing the best possible machinery to accomplish that purpose, and to send the bill to the committee with the thing already made up seems to me to be usurping the function of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator please repeat his amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the minute we instruct the committee we usurp its functions completely.

Mr. KING. The committee is the agent of the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. The motion reads:

With further instructions to include a section reading as follows.

My amendment is to strike out the words "The President is hereby" and to insert in lieu thereof "and report a provision authorizing and empowering the consolidation of bureaus, divisions," and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the author of the amendment whether that refers alone to the Interior Department.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As drawn it declines any power of transfer from one department to another, and applies exclusively to the department whose bill is under consideration—to wit, the Interior Department—except as it also relates to independent commissions.

Mr. JONES. Would it permit the committee to modify that provision in any way? If the bill is referred back to the committee—as I hope it will not be—would the motion permit the committee to amend the language of the proposed new section, or must we report it back as it is worded here?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should hope it would be perfected in any way that the committee sought to perfect it.

Mr. JONES. I take it that we are instructed to report back that provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as I understand the question and answer of the two Senators who have just spoken, the Senator from Michigan said that he understood the committee had authority to perfect his amendment. As I understand his amendment, the exact language must be reported by the committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I misunderstood the Senator. The Senator from Maryland is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I wanted to provide was that the committee would have the authority to phrase the provision in the most appropriate way to carry out what the Senator has in mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, the motion of the Senator from Tennessee has been modified now, and the amendment of the Senator from Michigan has been incorporated in it as part of his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator accepted that modification.

Mr. JONES. Yes; so I understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And this is a modification of that.

Mr. JONES. So I make the point of order that the whole motion is not germane to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of germaneness will be left to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire whether we have not already passed on that question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not on this particular one. This is in different form. Those who think it is germane will say "aye." [A pause.] Those who think it is not germane will say "no." [A pause.] The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. JONES. Let us have a roll call, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr.

Ashurst voted "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

amentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it. Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The greatest confusion prevails here as to what the question is that is submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the amendment that is offered by the Senator from Maryland to the modified motion of the Senator from Tennessee is garmana.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it. Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand the objection made by the Senator from Washington, it is that the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, together with my own amendment, is not germane—the whole question.

Mr. JONES. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan was incorporated in the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was accepted.

Mr. JONES. The point of germaneness is raised to the whole matter.

Mr. TYDINGS. As to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, as modified by my amendment?

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Tennessee has modified his motion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it. Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan having been accepted, and no point of order made, does not a point of order raised at this time come entirely too late?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so rules. When the amendment was accepted by the Senator from Tennessee it was the same as his own motion; and the question of germaneness will apply to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. The question now is whether that is germane.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. All of this discussion is out of order.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand the matter, then, the question is upon the germaneness of my amendment only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the roll call has begun and one Senator has answered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. The clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will proceed to call the roll. If any Senator objects, the roll call can not be interrupted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the question?

Mr. BRATTON. I am propounding a parliamentary in-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And the roll call has been started and one Senator has answered, and the regular order has been demanded.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am willing to withdraw my vote if it will contribute to the orderliness of the proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can not withdraw it unless by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senate is entitled to understand the question upon which it is voting. There is the greatest confusion. What is the question?

Mr. BRATTON. That is what I have been trying to ask the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in position now to state it, because the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Ashurst] has withdrawn his vote, and the vote will be taken anew.

The matter that is before the Senate is whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland to the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee, as qualified by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, accepted by the Senator from Tennessee, is germane.

Mr. BRATTON. Will the Chair state the amendment of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, do I understand that the Chair has ruled that my amendment is not germane to the proposition offered by the Senator from Tennessee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Chair leaves the question of germaneness to the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. But why need that question be submitted to the Senate—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Because the rules require it. Mr. TYDINGS. If the Chair will bear with me a moment until I state my viewpoint; how can that question be submitted to the Senate if the Chair has held that the proposition of the Senator from Michigan is properly on the bill? My amendment deals only with the subject which has already been adopted by the Senator's germane amendment. I certainly have a right to perfect his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not deciding the matter. He is leaving it to the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand so; but the question of germaneness ended when the Senate did not make any objection to the proposition of the Senator from Michigan. I certainly have a right to offer an amendment to perfect a matter which has already been declared to be germane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the objection as to germaneness was offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, let me say that the point I made was against the motion of the Senator from Tennessee as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. I did not know that the Senator from Maryland had offered an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And the Chair held that the point of order of the Senator from Washington on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee came too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Chair have the amendment of the Senator from Maryland stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland will please repeat his amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that if the Senate should hold that the amendment now is germane, he will then have an opportunity to amend this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senate shall hold that it is not germane, the point of order will be sustained, and it will go out. If, on the other hand, the Senate holds that the amendment is germane, then that amendment will be before the Senate for consideration, and the Senator from Maryland will then have an opportunity to offer his amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as I understand the pending question, the Chair has ruled that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is germane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Chair has made no such ruling.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I am mistaken.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to understand if my question of germaneness is before the Senate as to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. I have understood that we could always make the point of order at any time we desired to do so, and this is the first time the point of order has been invoked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator mean that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee is not germane to the bill?

Mr. JONES. Yes: as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If that is what the Senator means, that has already been decided by vote.

Mr. JONES. Not as amended. The matter of germaneness has not been decided.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the point of order must be made to an amendment before it is adopted. It can not be made afterwards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.
Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. When the Senator from Michigan offered his amendment it was in order to object to it on the ground that it was not germane. It would not be in order to wait until after it was accepted and incorporated and then object to it on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands the situation. I am not making the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is not germane. I am making the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, is not germane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington raises the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, as modified by the amendment, is not germane to the bill.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will leave the question of germaneness to a vote of the Senate. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. Bulkley]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. My colleague [Mr. WAGNER] is absent. He is paired. If present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. I understand that he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Cutting] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh];

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore];

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Patterson] with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]; and

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Morrison].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to state that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes] are necessarily absent in their home States on important business.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis], the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Broussard], the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Mor-RISON | are necessarily absent.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to announce that my colleague, Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that my colleague, Senator Swanson, of Virginia, is necessarily detained by attending the disarmament conference at Geneva.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I wish to announce that my colleague, Senator Walsh of Massachusetts is necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. Wheeler] is necessarily absent from the city. His pair has been announced.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 26, as follows:

So the Senate decided Mr. McKellar's motion as modified to be germane.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I voted on this question from its parliamentary status, that is, if we ever do vote with reference to the parliamentary status when a question of merit is at stake.

We have a rule of the Senate that no amendment proposing general legislation may be added to an appropriation bill. That has been quite strictly enforced for several years. During this session it is entirely ignored, in my opinion.

The motion presented by the Senator from Tennessee, in my opinion, was not subject to a point of order, because it was a motion to recommit with instructions to reduce the items in the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg], however, being accepted and becoming a part of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, in my opinion, made it subject to a point of order, because the amendment then was general legislation offered to an appropriation bill.

The salaries of all officers and employees have been fixed, not in an appropriation bill, but by general legislation. That, under our rules, can be changed only by general legislation. It can not be changed, in accordance with our rules, by any amendment to an appropriation bill, which has for its purpose and function the furnishing of money to carry out general legislation, and is not a vehicle for general legislation.

This motion proposes to instruct the committee to change the general law with regard to salaries, and undoubtedly is general legislation. However, as it seems to be customary at this session, the Chair, instead of ruling on the point of order, to avoid stultifying himself, submitted the matter.

We are ceasing to have any rules. But I want to have it distinctly understood now that twice we have done this, twice the Senate has held that anything which tends to reduce the expenses of the Government is in order on an appropriation bill.

I want my position in the matter distinctly understood. and any amendment I may offer from now on will be on the theory that while it is general legislation, and will change existing law, it will have a tendency, however, to reduce the expenses of the Government, and on the theory under which this point of order is overruled, it will be in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that if he should offer an amendment to an appropriation bill which was objected to on the ground that it was general legislation on an appropriation bill, all he would need to do would be to move to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to put his amendment on the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator. That procedure seems to be excellent. For instance, I have in mind that it might save the Government a great deal of money to abolish the Farm Board. That board was established by general legislation, by quite a long act. But why not offer an amendment instructing the committee to place an amendment on the appropriation bill abolishing the Farm Board? Does it not seem to be a splendid vehicle now for all remedial legislation? We could abolish half of the useless bureaus of the Government right now and get immediate action. We could consolidate a lot of bureaus we are talking about right now, under the theory that we can place general legislation on this appropriation bill if it reduces the cost to the Government.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.
Mr. BINGHAM. I may have misunderstood the question, but I did not understand that a point of order was raised against the amendment on the ground that it was new legislation; but I gather that the point was raised that it was not germane or relevant to the bill, and when the Chair announced the vote he announced, not that the Senate had overruled the point of order but that the Senate had ruled that the amendment was germane or relevant.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the guestion as to whether it is germane or not would depend on whether it was general legislation. But if there is any doubt with regard to the matter I make the point of order against it on the ground that it is general legislation and contrary to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would say to the Senator from Connecticut that the rules provide that if an appropriation bill on which there is general legislation comes to the Senate from the House of Representatives, an amendment proposing general legislation germane to what is in the bill may be offered as an amendment in this body, and the question as to whether it is or is not germane to general legislation which was put on the bill in the House shall be submitted. It is asserted that there is something in this bill in the nature of general legislation on the subject of the reduction of salaries, and it is contended that the amendment is germane to that portion of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, my recollection is that when this question was being debated the other day the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] held that there was no new legislation in sections 3 and 4-it may have been the Senator from Montana himself who so heldand that therefore an amendment changing those sections, and providing new legislation, could not be put into the bill without being subject to a point of order, because those sections were not in the nature of new legislation, but were in the nature of a restriction or limitation on the appropriation bill, and I thought the point was well taken.

In order to clear the air I hope that the Chair will now rule on the point of order raised by the Senator from Nevada that this is new legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I make the point of order that it is new legislation and general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to point out that sections 3 and 4 of the bill got into the bill in the House of Representatives through the passage of a resolution setting forth, in its own terms, that the rules of the House are virtually suspended in order to admit them. other words, the House concedes that they put general legislation upon this bill, and it confesses it in the form in which the action was taken in the House.

Since it was thus acknowledged initially to be general legislation, under the ruling of Vice President Marshall, to which I have repeatedly referred, the Senate is entitled to enter the field after the House has opened the gates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Secretary to report the amendment, because, as it appears to be written now, it has certainly been changed without action by the Senate. I refer to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. As he offered the provision it authorized the President to make consolidations of bureaus in the Department of the Interior for the purpose of carrying out the provisions in the first part of the amendment calling for a reduction in the aggregate amount of the appropriation. Is that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask the attention of the Senator from Connecticut. It was pointed out by the Senator from Idaho and by two or three other Senators during the course of the debate on the point of order a day or two ago, that the President had, under existing law, the authority to make such consolidations. I think he has now the right to make consolidations of bureaus under laws that already exist, and therefore this amendment is not new legislation. The amendment which was offered the other day provided for the abolishment of bureaus which were created by acts of Congress, and that plainly constituted a change in existing law and constituted new legislation, as I then pointed out. For that reason I think there is a distinction clearly to be made between the situation as it arises now and that which we determined the other day.

If it were not for the fact that existing law gives the President all the authority that is given in the present amendment, it would be obnoxious to the rule of the Senate. It would not be obnoxious to the rule of the House of Representatives known as the Holman rule, in all probability, but to obviate any question as to the former amendment which the Senate properly, I think, held to be not germane, the House did adopt a special rule relieving from any question of doubt on the subject, although the provisions in the bill referred to were in the form of limitations.

But this is an entirely different question. The mere incorporation in an amendment or in a bill of the existing law, the repetition of it, in my judgment, would not constitute a violation of the rule of the Senate. As I see it, the only reason for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is that he couples with the proposal of the Senator from Ten-that he couples with the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee to reduce, a suggestion that the plan for consolidations already authorized be carried out. It is not new legislation in that sense of the term in my understanding.

In so far as it being proper to submit the matter to the Senate, I must say in fairness that the rule requires all questions of this character to be submitted to the Senate. It expressly provides, as is well understood, I think, when Senators reflect, that when a point of order is raised against an amendment or provision as not being germane, the Chair must submit that question to the Senate. It is believed that the distinction between the present amendment and the one we passed upon the other day has been made clear in the statement I have made. I may be in error about it, but that is the view I entertain.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, obviously the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Pittman] regards it as new legislation. It occurs to me that when we were studying the question of consolidating the bureaus which deal with our insular possessions and islands over the sea, we were told that while the President could transfer the affairs of the Virgin Islands and Samoa and Guam from the Navy Department to any other department, he could not transfer the affairs of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico because by law they had expressly been placed in the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is of the opinion that much of the discussion has proceeded under a misapprehension of terms. The Chair does not think the Senate is dealing with an amendment to the bill. The bill having been read a third time, no amendment can be offered. The Senate is dealing with a motion to recommit, with instructions, and the Senate has determined that the language of that motion is germane. The instructions contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings] to the motion have no effect upon the rule whatever until the committee has acted and reported back legislation, when the Senate could deal with that question in whatever form it may then arise. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the Senator from Nevada, and the question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would like to have the amendment stated.

.The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Maryland proposes to strike out the words "The President is hereby authorized and empowered to consolidate" and insert in lieu thereof "and report a provision authorizing and empowering the consolidation of bureaus, divisions, and commissions, in whole or in part, related changes in administration deemed advisable so as to effect economies and keep expenditures within the reduced appropriations herein set out."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a brief word of explanation for those who may not have been in the Chamber when I offered the amendment.

The amendment of the Senator from Michigan provided that the President should be empowered and authorized to effect these consolidations. My amendment simply strikes out the words "The President is hereby authorized and empowered," and directs the committee to deal with the subject of consolidation, and so forth, in the best manner that it may see fit. In other words, instead of confining the committee to bringing in a section in the exact language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, the committee must bring in an amendment instead of dealing with that subject in such form as it thinks best.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that if we incorporate the amendment of the Senator from Maryland and direct the committee to report a legislative provision, a change in existing law, we will unquestionably, according to all the parliamentary authorities, make the provision subject to a point of order. If the amendment of the Senator from Maryland should be agreed to and the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] should then make his point of order against the whole provision that it is not germane, according to the precedents it would go out. For that reason I think the amendment of the Senator from Maryland should not be agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, aside from the parliamentary question, as I understand the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, it is that the committee is to go out and reorganize these bureaus and bring in whatever changes it sees fit.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. We will not be here long enough for that.
Mr. TYDINGS. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to say that that is not correct, I believe.

Mr. BORAH. Then I misunderstood its purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. The amendment provides that instead of the committee adopting the exact words offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg], in which the Senator from Michigan provided that the committee should incorporate in the bill, when it is reported back, an exact section as written by him, the committee is free to adopt such language dealing with the subject of consolidation as it sees fit. It could take the exact language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan or it could provide for a special committee of Congress to look into the matter, or it could do any number of things; but under the situation as it now exists the committee would have to report back the exact language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, without the right to dot an "i" or cross a "t."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. In view of what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] just said, it appears to me that, perhaps, although my intentions were well taken, that I may undo some provisions which already provide for the thought I had in mind. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is at liberty to withdraw his amendment at any time prior to a vote upon it. The Senator from Maryland withdraws his amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask for a separate vote on the two paragraphs of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee and the proposal of the Senator from Michigan having been condensed in one motion, the question may be divided. The question now is upon the first paragraph of the motion proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the second branch of the motion proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. AUSTIN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote regarding my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes]. I withhold my vote.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with regard to my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. Bulkley], I withhold my vote.

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long], I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Understanding that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson], with whom I have a general pair, would vote as I expect to vote, I feel free to vote and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Again announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Stephens], I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN. I now understand that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes], with whom I have a pair, would vote the same as I wish to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Davis] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan];

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to have the Secretary read a letter addressed to the President of the Senate by Mr. Barrett.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair announce that the bill is recommitted to the committee with instructions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I prefer, before the announcement is made, to have the letter read, as it relates to the Interior Department. I ask that the Secretary read a letter written by Mr. Barrett in reply to the letter written by Secretary Wilbur and published in the RECORD yesterday at the instance of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1932.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

My DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is unfortunate that the Secretary of the Interior has attempted to justify the Interior Department's actions in handling the war mineral relief claims which have been inherited by him from previous administrations and which regrettably have met with much of the same lack of prompt and reasonable consideration marking the whole procedure for the past 14 years. There has been no question raised as to the integrity of Secretary Wilbur, who is esteemed as a most excellent gentleman, but there is ground for belief that he has neither adequate nor complete knowledge of these claims which belief is justified by the inaccuracies both as to the figures quoted and the relationships cited in his letter regarding these claims.

Nearly 14 years ago farmers of many States appealed to me as Nearly 14 years ago farmers of many States appeared to me as president of the National Farmers Union to help them get the money the Government owed them for the mining of pyrites, manganese, and two other minerals, to prosecute the war. These same farmers had been helping to pay my salary and expenses as president of the National Farmers Union for many, many years. Why shouldn't I be interested in this matter? I have worked on it for nearly 14 years and will work for 14 years longer if necessary.

As for being a lobbyist, I never received a penny in my entire lifetime for helping to promote a bill or defeat a bill before Congress or any other legislative body. Secretary Wilbur says I injected myself in this matter last week. I hope this is not a sample of what he knows about the Interior Department.

About 14 years ago I went with Mr. George L. Pratt and some other gentlemen to the offices of Congressmen William Schley Howard, of Georgia, and Otis Wingo, of Arkansas, and assisted them in the passage of the war mineral relief act of March 2, 1919, and in 1929 I went with Mr. George L. Pratt and some other gentlemen to the office of Mr. Carl Vinson and Otis Wingo and again assisted in the passage of the act of February 13, 1929, 1919, and in 1929 I went with Mr. George L. Pratt and some other gentlemen to the office of Mr. Carl Vinson and Otis Wingo and again assisted in the passage of the act of February 13, 1929, which conferred jurisdiction on the court to make awards which theretofore the Secretary had denied. Both bills were duly passed by Congress, and under decision of the courts thereunder a large number of claimants are entitled to recover—which they have not yet done. Not only these two bills but three other bills have passed Congress regarding this matter, and the Supreme Court of the United States has also said these debts should be paid. Nearly three months after the order from the highest court in the land to act, the Department of the Interior handling this matter had failed to settle. No wonder despair took the place of hope in the gentlemen who had suffered so much at the hands of the Government they had served so well.

The principals in this Chestatee Pyrites & Chemical Corporation claim, Lee Ashcraft, Mell Wikinson, and George L. Pratt, are my neighbors and my friends, whom the entire citizenship of the great State of Georgia admire, trust, and would defend. Years of association have revealed them to me personally in all their integrity and outstanding loyalty. At the time of the Nation's need, when we were engaged in the World War, they responded with their time and means to serve with a loyalty and liberality scarcely equaled and never surpassed by any citizens anywhere. The fruits of their endeavor at the call of their country have been to wreck the individual fortune of George L. Pratt and his brother, everything gone and obligations yet to be met which will tax wreck the individual fortune of George L. Pratt and his brother, everything gone and obligations yet to be met which will tax their strength to their last breath, while Ashcraft and Wilkinson can never measure either the time or the treasure they have put to their country's service.

In all reasonableness, in utmost justice, in keeping with every In all reasonableness, in utmost justice, in keeping with every human impulse, fighting every step of the way for settlement, supported by Congress, sustained by the highest court of the land, 14 years of expense, worry, disappointment, and near despair, justified in every claim, I do feel that the Secretary of the Interior laid an unfair charge against these gentlemen to accuse them of being in a lobby when they are only here now, as they have been for the past 14 years, trying to get a department of the Government to perform a reasonable and just duty. There is no greater glory to be attached to any man anywhere than to be known and rated as a true, upright American citizen as are these gentlemen. There is no public official, no matter in what capacity, who is high There is no public official, no matter in what capacity, who is high enough not to duly recognize the value and rights of such citizenship, and he can not hope to be free from just criticism in stigmatizing or attempting to stigmatize an individual or individuals rightly, decently, and honestly performing a task however they may regret its necessity but made mandatory to obtain their rights.

My own interest in these war claims, the Chestatee claim being a test case to establish the validity of all such claims, dating back over a period of 14 years, is further intensified by the fact which should be official knowledge that numerous farmers, many of them members of the very organization which honored me with leadership for near a quarter of a century, had responded at the country's call during the war and in so doing there arose these claims which have had such faltering and inexcusable delay in settlement.

It makes little difference to me what some one in official capacity may desire to term my life and activities, but of this I hold the happy realization as well as the marked appreciation of my brethren over quite an eventful life. I have never faltered in attempting to serve the farmer whenever and wherever the call has come.

There are many of these farmer claims, some of them in small amounts; but, whether small or great, they, in many instances, represented their very all. For lack of fair treatment many of these loyal souls have lost their homes and even some have died in despair. This is a fact too bitter and severe to permit any mincing of words or longer delay in getting settlements from the department where and only where the settlements must and can be made. be made.

I can't help but feel that our Government has no excuse in delay and certainly no justification in condoning delay in the functioning of machinery on such important and imperative matters as these, especially in the light of what the farmers of the United States did in response to the call of the Nation when the grim specter of war clouded the land. No brighter chapter the grim specier of war clouded the land. No brighter chapter in the history of the Nation was ever written than that of the farmers of that time. Whatever humble efforts I have been able to put forth in what I feel is a just cause have been contributed with the fullness of heart and the open courage I have always felt was due.

The chief causes of the long delay and the gross miscarriage of justice in the settlement of these debts is not Secretary Wilbur but have been the erroneous rulings on questions of law through years that have passed by the Solicitors of the Department of the Interior and their assistants, which have now finally been reversed by the highest court in the land. To have settled these claims promptly after they were originally filed in accordance with the law, as now construed by the court, would have saved the Government a little short of a million dollars.

Secretary Wilbur is correct in a statement in his letter. I did go to the Capitol to seek out and consult with many Senators on this matter. Here is the reason why:

I have been in and out of Washington for now going on to 30 years. I have the rare privilege of knowing many of the statesmen who make up our National Congress. I went up among those whom I knew and who have never failed me during the many lose years. You grow to trust and you learn to honor those whose courage and integrity have never faltered. I am grateful for the privilege of the acquaintance and association of these true men.

As to the "irresponsible recommendation" for abolishment of the Department of the Interior, of course that might be a subject the Department of the Interior, of course that might be a subject for careful study and likewise profound consideration, even getting to the point of possibly favorable consideration in the mind of Secretary Wilbur himself when he gets a more accurate knowledge of the reasons leading to the recommendation.

If any proof is needed as to the merits of the claim of the Chestatee Pyrites & Chemical Corporation, the important test case in all of these claims so inexcusably and brutally delayed settlement, reference can be had to more than 1,000 pages of printed record in the form of House and Senate documents, committee reports, judgments of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Government is appropriating billions of dollars to release

The Government is appropriating billions of dollars to release frozen assets. What assets can be more completely frozen than these just debts of the Government to these claimants, and why, these just debts of the Government to these claimants, and why, therefore, should they not be promptly paid?

In view of all the distressing delay endured, I am proud to learn of the announcement that attention and action is promised on these claims; but I am still wondering how much longer before these claims will be paid and stop the expense and anxiety to the claimants and the additional expense to the Government.

Respectfully,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be recommitted, with the instructions embodied in the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar].

CLAIM OF THE FRANKLIN SURETY CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report and recommendation concerning the claim of the Franklin Surety Co. v. the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE LATE JOHN PHILIP SOUSA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution unanimously adopted by the Council of the City of Los Angeles, Calif., as a tribute to the memory of the late John Philip Sousa, America's eminent composer of martial music, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BOISE (IDAHO) ASSAY OFFICE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Exchange Club, of Boise, Idaho, favoring the making of an adequate appropriation for the operation of the Boise, Idaho, assay office for the coming fiscal year, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the House Committee on Appropriations has falled to appropriate money for the operation of the United States assay office at Boise, Idaho, for the next fiscal year, and said assay office will have to be discontinued unless an appropriation is authorized by the House of Representatives and the United States

Senate; and

Whereas it would be in the nature of a calamity to have this Whereas it would be in the nature of a calamity to have this Boise assay office discontinued at this time. It is rendering a great and valuable service to hundreds of men who because of lack of employment are compelled to take to the hills and placer mine for gold in order to eke out an existence. These men will have no place to sell their small lots of gold without taking a heavy discount if this assay office is discontinued, and they can ill afford to wait a week or 10 days for shipment and returns from San Francisco, Seattle, or Denver; and

Whereas it would be in the nature of a calamity to have increased over 200 per cent at the Boise assay office.

in value have increased over 200 per cent at the Boise assay office during the last year, and will in all probability increase much more than that this year because the unemployment situation is much more acute; and

Whereas the Boise assay office is preparing to move from its present quarters to rooms in the Federal Building, where it can function just as efficiently and at a saving of about $1,500 per year; and

Whereas gold-mining activity in the territory adjacent to the Boise assay office has increased greatly because of adverse economic conditions, and should be encouraged in every way possible; and

Whereas the report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1931, shows the value of bullion received at the Boise assay office totaled over one-third of a million dollars, and was greater than the combined value of all bullion received and was greater than the combined value of all bullion received at the assay offices at Carson, Nev.; Helena, Mont.; and Salt Lake City, Utah; and

Whereas the Boise assay office is rendering a much-needed service in this mining district in assaying gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc ores for miners and prospectors in addition to the regular work of purchasing bullion for coinage; and
Whereas the Boise assay office is doing 55.8 per cent of all the "nonmint bullion assay work" performed by the mint service in the United States; and
Whereas the United States Congress in its appropriations of billions of dollars for emergency relief of railroads, banks, and others might well brush a few crumbs off the table for the struggling prospector and miner who produces the gold that stabilizes the whole credit structure of the Nation and makes possible such institutions as the Federal Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and others; and

whereas the miner and prospector are entitled to every consideration along with the farmer, merchant, and banker, and the least that could be expected is that Congress continue the appropriation for the Boise assay office and consider it as one of the most justifiable subsidies ever granted: Now, therefore, be it use their good influence and persuasion with the present Congress to make an appropriation sufficiently adequate to finance the operation of the Boise assay office for the coming fiscal year; be

Resolved, That the Exchange Club of Boise prays on behalf of the miner and prospector and the unemployed that the United States assay office at Boise be not discontinued; be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be presented to the local newspapers and service clubs and their cooperation solicited and that copies be mailed to the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives and the honorable President of the United States Senate, with the request that it be spread upon the Journal of the present Congress.

Resolution by S. K. Atkinson.

THE MARYLAND CAR WHEEL Co., Baltimore, Md., March 16, 1932.

Hon. PHILLIPS LEE GOLDSBOROUGH,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This letter is not meant for reply. I do want to let you know, however, that I feel very strongly about the present revenue bill which no doubt is the most important that you have had to consider.

The only successful business enterprises in this country to-day are those who have balanced their budget, and it seems to me the simple economics of such a policy apply equally forcibly to our National Government.

I, of course, do not like to pay more taxes, but I am perfectly willing to "grin and bear" it and share in the load if Congress does its part in passing as equitable a law as it can, which has as its main purpose the early balancing of our National Budget.

Yours very truly,

D. H. SHERWOOD. Vice President.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, an organization with headquarters in New York has been flooding the desks of Representatives in Congress and Senators with communications and alleged newspaper surveys not based upon the bills reported by either the House or the Senate, but upon the subject of immediate independence.

Just by way of a short answer to these 25 or 30 exporters amongst the very large number of petitions received by me, but with which I have not filled the RECORD, I present only one. It is a resolution adopted by the Central Trades and Labor Union of the city of St. Louis. It was adopted by unanimous vote, and at the time of its passage there were 250 delegates present, each representing a different trade or occupation. These 250 delegates represent a combined membership of approximately 65,000 members.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD the resolution adopted

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill by Senators Hawes and Cutting, granting full independence to the peoples of the Philippine Islands, said bill being known as Senate bill No. 3377; and

Whereas in granting full and complete independence to the peoples of the Philippine Islands we are but living up to the promise made those people when we acquired these islands from Spain; and

Whereas the manufactured products from the Philippine Islands have now reached a stage, with no tariff regulations, that the products from that country, with their attendant cheap labor, have become a real menace to American labor and American industries;

Whereas we are of the opinion and firm belief that in granting full and complete independence to the peoples of the Philippine Islands that we are fulfilling our solemn pledge to those people, who have shown they are capable of self-government, and at the same time giving protection to American labor and American industries: Therefore be it ... Resolved, That this Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis, Mo., with its 65,000 affiliated members goes on record as favoring the full and complete independence of the peoples of the Philip-the full and complete independence of the peoples of the Philippine Islands; and be it further

*Resolved*, That a copy of this resolution be sent to our two United States Senators from Missouri and all of the Members of the United States House of Representatives from Missouri.

Adopted this 13th day of March, 1932, by the Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the Central Trades and Labor Union is only a local organization. The national organization, representing 5,000,000 members, favors the adoption of an independence measure.

Supplementing the efforts of the union labor organizations, with a membership of 5,000,000, are the three nationally organized farm organizations, the Cooperative Milk Producers Association, the National Dairy Association, the organizations in 19 beet-sugar States and eight cane-growing States.

If these national farm organizations accurately represent the opinion of the farmers of the United States, they speak for 6.297.877 Americans; but if they only represent the actual membership in their organizations, they speak for 3,950,000 farmers.

It is estimated that there is a farm investment of $52,747,000,000; an investment in the dairy business of $375,000,000. The combined investment of all the members of the New York Filipino Chamber of Commerce-the exporters' organization which is flooding Congress with its appeals against independence—would represent an infinitesimal number, and in dollars and cents a relatively small investment compared with that of even the farm and dairy interests, omitting entirely the subject of the beet-sugar and cane-sugar investment.

It is well for the Senate to understand that the plea for Philippine independence on the part of union labor has been consistent and persistent since 1899.

Now, supplementing these forces are the States on the Pacific coast who want a limitation on Philippine immigration, and to these exclusionists must be added the national expression of opinion of the American Legion, with its hundreds of thousands of members.

Against the little organization of New York exporters now attempting to deceive Congress we find arrayed the elements of our population which I have enumerated.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

"(g) Advising or notifying any person of an intention to do any of the acts heretofore specified;

"(h) Agreeing with other persons to do or not to do any of the acts heretofore specified; and

"(i) Advising, urging, or otherwise causing or inducing without fraud or violence the acts heretofore specified, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this act.

"Sec. 5. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue a restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction upon the ground that any of the persons participating or interested in a labor dispute constitute, or are engaged in, an unlawful combination or conspiracy because of the doing in concert of the acts enumerated in section 4 of this act.

"SEC. 6. No officer or member of any association or organization, and no association or organization participating or interested in a labor dispute, shall be held responsible or liable in any court of the United States for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents, except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization of, such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof.

"SEC. 7. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue a temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, as herein defined, except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court (with opportunity for cross-examination) in support of the allegations of a complaint made under oath, and testimony in opposition thereto, if offered, and except after findings of fact, by the court, to the effect-

"(a) That unlawful acts have been threatened and will be committed unless restrained or have been committed and will be continued unless restrained, but no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons, association or organization making the threat or committing the unlawful act or actually authorizing or ratifying the same after actual knowledge thereof;

"(b) That substantial and irreparable injury to complainant's property will follow;

"(c) That as to each item of relief granted greater injury will be inflicted upon complainant by the denial of relief than will be inflicted upon defendants by the granting of relief:

"(d) That complainant has no adequate remedy at law; and

"(e) That the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

"Such hearing shall be held after due and personal notice thereof has been given, in such manner as the court shall direct, to all known persons against whom relief is sought, and also to the chief of those public officials of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed charged with the duty to protect complainant's property: Provided, however, That if a complainant shall also allege that, unless a temporary restraining order shall be issued without notice, a substantial and irreparable injury to complainant's property will be unavoidable, such a temporary restraining order may be issued upon testimony under oath, sufficient, if sustained, to justify the court in issuing a temporary injunction upon a hearing after notice. Such a temporary restraining order shall be effective for no longer than five days and shall become void at the expiration of said five days. No temporary restraining order or temporary injunction shall be issued except on condition that complainant shall first file an undertaking with adequate security in an amount to be fixed by the court sufficient to recompense those enjoined for any loss, expense, or damage caused by the improvident or erroneous issuance of such order or injunction, including all reasonable costs (together with a reasonable attorney's fee) and expense of defense against the order or against the granting of any injunctive relief sought in the same proceeding and subsequently denied by the court.

"The undertaking herein mentioned shall be understood to signify an agreement entered into by the complainant and the surety upon which a decree may be rendered in the same suit or proceeding against said complainant and surety, upon a hearing to assess damages of which hearing complainant and surety shall have reasonable notice, the said complainant and surety submitting themselves to the jurisdiction of the court for that purpose. But nothing herein contained shall deprive any party having a claim or cause of action under or upon such undertaking from electing to pursue his ordinary remedy by suit at law or in equity.

"SEC. 8. No restraining order or injunctive relief shall be granted to any complainant who has failed to comply with any obligation imposed by law which is involved in the labor dispute in question, or who has failed to make every reasonable effort to settle such dispute either by negotiation or with the aid of any available governmental machinery of mediation or voluntary arbitration.

"SEC. 9. No restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction shall be granted in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, except on the basis of findings of fact made and filed by the court in the record of the case prior to the issuance of such restraining order or injunction; and every restraining order or injunction granted in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute shall include only a prohibition of such specific act or acts as may be expressly complained of in the bill of complaint or petition filed in such case and as shall be expressly included in said findings of fact made and filed by the court as provided herein.

"SEC. 10. Whenever any court of the United States shall issue or deny any temporary injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, the court shall, upon the request of any party to the proceedings and on his filing the usual bond for costs, forthwith certify as in ordinary cases the record of the case to the circuit court of appeals for its review. Upon the filing of such record in the circuit court of appeals, the appeal shall be heard and the temporary injunctive order affirmed, modified, or set aside with the greatest possible expedition, giving the proceeding precedence over all other matters except older matters of the same character.

SEC. 11. In all cases arising under this act in which a person shall be charged with contempt in a court of the United States (as herein defined), the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the contempt shall have been committed: Provided, That this right shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice or to apply to the misbehavior, misconduct, or disobedience of any officer of the court in respect to the writs, orders, or process of the court.

"Sec. 12. The defendant in any proceeding for contempt of court may file with the court a demand for the retirement of the judge sitting in the proceeding, if the contempt arises from an attack upon the character or conduct of such judge, and if the attack occurred elsewhere than in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice. Upon the filing of any such demand the judge shall thereupon proceed no further, but another judge shall be designated in the same manner as is provided by law. The demand shall be filed prior to the hearing in the contempt proceeding.

"SEC. 13. When used in this act and for the purposes of

"(a) A case shall be held to involve or to grow out of a labor dispute when the case involves persons who are engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation; or have direct or indirect interests therein; or who are employees of the same employer; or who are members of the same or an affiliated organization of employers or employees; whether such dispute is (1) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employees or associations of employees; (2) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employers or associations of employers; or (3) between one or more employees or associations of employees and one or more employees or associations of employees; or when the case involves any conflicting or competing interests in a 'labor dispute' (as hereinafter defined) of 'persons participating or interested' therein (as hereinafter defined).

"(b) A person or association shall be held to be a person participating or interested in a labor dispute if relief is sought against him or it, and if he or it is engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation in which such dispute occurs, or has a direct or indirect interest therein, or is a member, officer, or agent of any association composed in whole or in part of employers or employees engaged in such industry, trade, craft, or occupation.

"(c) The term 'labor dispute' includes any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

"(d) The term 'court of the United States' means any court of the United States whose jurisdiction has been or may be conferred or defined or limited by act of Congress, including the courts of the District of Columbia.

"Sec. 14. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held unconstitutional or otherwise invalid, the remaining provisions of the act and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 15. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have received a large number of letters and telegrams, perhaps similar to the ones received by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], in behalf of the retention of the Farm Board and granting very liberal appropriations for the maintenance of the board. Many of the telegrams indicate, however, that they were inspired by the same individual, who is connected indirectly with the Farm Board, and who is the beneficiary of a loan from the Farm Board.

IMPORT TAX ON GASOLINE

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the telegram will be read.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., March 11, 1932.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD:

Import tax on gasoline and crude oil brings further distress to consumer. Urge vote against it.

oil excise tax is being artificially stimulated by those interested in the continued free importation of cheap foreign oil, to the detriment of American labor and the ruin of many American industries. The methods which are used may seem ethical to some, but, in fact, they constitute a most serious breach of conduct.

I have received from my State several hundred telegrams protesting against this oil excise tax. This sudden display of what appeared to be popular interest caused me to investigate, and I found that the signers of these petitions were employees or relatives of employees of filling stations and other plants controlled by subsidiaries of the great oil importers. I found that many of the signers were not even voters. This unusual volume of protests against a measure which is so generally favored by the people of my State is merely the propaganda of those who are interested in the continuance of the present unjustifiable discrimination against an American product and against American labor in favor of a foreign product.

I find that others have been receiving similar telegrams. A Member of the other branch of Congress has told of thousands of such messages, also inspired by the oil-importing corporations, with the intent to mislead Members of Congress into the belief that there is a general popular opposition to this measure. How far this telegraphic campaign extends I do not know.

Opponents of the excise tax confess their weakness when they stoop to such methods. If they had any persuasive arguments, or if there were sufficient public opinion to support their cause, they would not need to resort to subterfuges in a rather hopeless attempt to make us believe that the citizens of this Nation are not in favor of a moderate tax upon a foreign product which has worked havoc with the prosperity of our country.

return to legislative session in connection with the appropriation bill which has recently been made the unfinished business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.
The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou in whose presence we wait, we thank Thee for the history of the Republic. It is a goodly vine we have inherited. Its clusters of blessings hang richly and its roots run out in many ways for the welfare of our people. Always enable us to understand our responsibilities and to see the possibility of a greater patriotism. Make it an inspiration for us to go out and be better citizens and to carry to higher usefulness the influence which we possess. O Father, bless all philanthropies which go forward to reach the ignorant, to give bread to the hungry, and to give freedom to those who are oppressed. Permit all good things to survive and succeed. Grant us, Heavenly Father, courage to withstand all temptations of power, position, and pride. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE ANTI-INJUNCTION BILL

Mr. CRISP and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. CRISP. I was about to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tax bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Sumners] wishes to call up the conference report on the anti-injunction bill, and the Chair thinks that had better be disposed of first.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, may I make a brief statement? Personally I have no objection to taking up the antiinjunction bill at this time, but the House has agreed to have to-day for general debate on the tax bill. Some Members might find fault for taking up this injunction bill and doing something to take away the opportunity for further discussion. Would it not be better to let this go over until to-morrow when general debate will be closed?

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. DYER. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that in my judgment there will be no time taken in connection with the report on the anti-injunction bill. It is a unanimous report, and there is really nothing new in it of substance-merely a transposition of some words and one or two slight amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the conference report at this time?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5315) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that the statement be read in lieu of the report?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5315) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That no court of the United States, as herein defined, shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, except in a strict conformity with the provisions of this act; nor shall any such restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction be issued contrary to the public policy declared in this act.

"SEC. 2. In the interpretation of this act and in determining the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States, as such jurisdiction and authority are herein defined and limited, the public policy of the United States is hereby declared as follows:

"Whereas under prevailing economic conditions, developed with the aid of governmental authority for owners of property to organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association, the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment, wherefore, though he should be free to decline to associate with his fellows, it is necessary that he have full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; therefore, the following definitions of, and limitations upon, the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States are hereby enacted.

Sec. 3. Any undertaking or promise, such as is described in this section, or any other undertaking or promise in conflict with the public policy declared in section 2 of this act, is hereby declared to be contrary to the public policy of the United States, shall not be enforceable in any court of the United States and shall not afford any basis for the granting of legal or equitable relief by any such court, including specifically the following:

Every undertaking or promise hereafter made, whether written or oral, express or implied, constituting or contained in any contract or agreement of hiring or employment between any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, and any employee or prospective employee of the same, whereby

"(a) Either party to such contract or agreement undertakes or promises not to join, become, or remain a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization; or

"(b) Either party to such contract or agreement undertakes or promises that he will withdraw from an employment relation in the event that he joins, becomes, or remains a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization.

"SEC. 4. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of any labor dispute to prohibit any person or persons participating or interested in such dispute (as these terms are herein defined) from doing, whether singly or in concert, any of the following acts:

"(a) Ceasing or refusing to perform any work or to remain in any relation of employment;

"(b) Becoming or remaining a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this act;

"(c) Paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person participating or interested in such labor dispute, any strike or unemployment benefits or insurance, or other moneys or things of value:

"(d) By all lawful means aiding any person participating or interested in any labor dispute who is being proceeded against in, or is prosecuting, any action or suit in any court of the United States or of any State;

"(e) Giving publicity to the existence of, or the facts involved in, any labor dispute, whether by advertising, speaking, patrolling, or by any other method not involving fraud or violence;

"(f) Assembling peaceably to act or to organize to act in promotion of their interests in a labor dispute;

"(g) Advising or notifying any person of an intention to do any of the acts heretofore specified;

"(h) Agreeing with other persons to do or not to do any of the acts heretofore specified; and

"(i) Advising, urging, or otherwise causing or inducing without fraud or violence the acts heretofore specified, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this act.

"SEC. 5. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue a restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction upon the ground that any of the persons participating or interested in a labor dispute constitute or are engaged in an unlawful combination or conspiracy because of the doing in concert of the acts enumerated in section 4 of this act.

"Sec. 6. No officer or member of any association or organization, and no association or organization participating or interested in a labor dispute, shall be held responsible or liable in any court of the United States for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents, except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization of, such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof.

"Sec. 7. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue a temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, as herein defined, except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court (with opportunity for cross-examination) in support of the allegations of a complaint made under oath, and testimony in opposition thereto, if offered, and except after findings of fact by the court, to the effect—

"(a) That unlawful acts have been threatened and will be committed unless restrained or have been committed and will be continued unless restrained, but no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons, association, or organization making the threat or committing the unlawful act or actually authorizing or ratifying the same after actual knowledge thereof;

"(b) That substantial and irreparable injury to complain-

ant's property will follow;

"(c) That as to each item of relief granted greater injury will be inflicted upon complainant by the denial of relief than will be inflicted upon defendants by the granting of relief:

"(d) That complainant has no adequate remedy at law;

"(e) That the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

"Such hearing shall be held after due and personal notice thereof has been given, in such manner as the court shall direct, to all known persons against whom relief is sought, and also to the chief of those public officials of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed charged with the duty to protect complainant's property: Provided, however, That if a complainant shall also allege that, unless a temporary restraining order shall be issued without notice, a substantial and irreparable injury to complainant's property will be unavoidable, such a temporary restraining order may be issued upon testimony under oath, sufficient, if sustained, to justify the court in issuing a temporary injunction upon a hearing after notice. Such a temporary restraining order shall be effective for no longer than five days and shall become void at the expiration of said five days. No temporary restraining order or temporary injunction shall be issued except on condition that complainant shall first file an undertaking with adequate security in an amount to be fixed by the court sufficient to recompense those enjoined for any loss, expense, or damage caused by the improvident or erroneous issuance of such order or injunction, including all reasonable costs (together with a reasonable attorney's fee) and expense of defense against the order or against the granting of any injunctive relief sought in the same proceeding and subsequently denied by the court.

"The undertaking herein mentioned shall be understood to signify an agreement entered into by the complainant and the surety upon which a decree may be rendered in the same suit or proceeding against said complainant and surety, upon a hearing to assess damages of which hearing complainant and surety shall have reasonable notice, the said complainant and surety submitting themselves to the jurisdiction of the court for that purpose. But nothing herein contained shall deprive any party having a claim or cause of action under or upon such undertaking from electing to pursue his ordinary remedy by suit at law or in equity.

"Sec. 8. No restraining order or injunctive relief shall be granted to any complainant who has failed to comply with any obligation imposed by law which is involved in the labor dispute in question, or who has failed to make every reasonable effort to settle such dispute either by negotiation or with the aid of any available governmental machinery of mediation or voluntary arbitration.

"Sec. 9. No restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction shall be granted in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, except on the basis of findings of fact made and filed by the court in the record of the case prior to the issuance of such restraining order or injunction; and every restraining order or injunction granted in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute shall include only a prohibition of such specific act or acts as may be expressly complained of in the bill of complaint or petition filed in such case and as shall be expressly included in said findings of fact made and filed by the court as provided berein

"Sec. 10. Whenever any court of the United States shall issue or deny any temporary injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, the court shall, upon the request of any party to the proceedings and on his filing the usual bond for costs, forthwith certify as in ordinary cases the record of the case to the circuit court of appeals for its review. Upon the filing of such record in the circuit court of appeals, the appeal shall be heard and the temporary injunctive order affirmed, modified, or set aside with the greatest possible expedition, giving the proceeding precedence over all other matters except older matters of the same character.

"Sec. 11. In all cases arising under this act in which a person shall be charged with contempt in a court of the United States (as herein defined), the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the contempt shall have been committed: Provided, That this right shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice or to apply to the misbehavior, misconduct, or disobedience of any officer of the court in respect to the writs, orders, or process of the court.

"Sec. 12. The defendant in any proceeding for contempt of court may file with the court a demand for the retirement of the judge sitting in the proceeding, if the contempt arises from an attack upon the character or conduct of such judge and if the attack occurred elsewhere than in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice. Upon the filing of any such demand the judge shall thereupon proceed no further, but another judge shall be designated in the same manner as is provided by law. The demand shall be filed prior to the hearing in the contempt proceeding.

"SEC. 13. When used in this act, and for the purposes of this act—

"(a) A case shall be held to involve or to grow out of a labor dispute when the case involves persons who are engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation; or have direct or indirect interests therein; or who are employees of the same employer; or who are members of the same or an affiliated organization of employers or employees; whether such dispute is (1) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employees or associations of employees; (2) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employers or associations of employers; or (3) between one or more employees or associations of employees and one or more employees or associations of employees; or when the case involves any conflicting or competing interests in a 'labor dispute' (as hereinafter defined) of 'persons participating or interested' therein (as hereinafter defined).

"(b) A person or association shall be held to be a person participating or interested in a labor dispute if relief is sought against him or it, and if he or it is engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation in which such dispute occurs, or has a direct or indirect interest therein, or is a member, officer, or agent of any association composed in whole or in part of employers or employees engaged in such industry, trade, craft, or occupation.

"(c) The term 'labor dispute' includes any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

"(d) The term 'court of the United States' means any court of the United States whose jurisdiction has been or may be conferred or defined or limited by act of Congress, including the courts of the District of Columbia.

"Sec. 14. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held unconstitutional or otherwise invalid, the remaining provisions of the act and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 15. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5315) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Section 2 of the Senate amendment contains, in the statement of the policy of the legislation, the phrase "though he (the individual unorganized worker) should be free to decline to associate with his fellows." The phrase is not employed in the corresponding provision in the House bill. The conference agreement adopts the Senate provision.

Section 3 of the House bill and of the Senate amendment are identical except for minor differences in punctuation. The conference agreement adopts the Senate amendment with minor changes in punctuation.

There are minor differences in the punctuation of section 4 (c) of the House bill and the Senate amendment. The conference agreement adopts the Senate provision.

Section 6 of the Senate amendment provides that no court of the United States shall have jurisdiction upon the hearing of an application for temporary restraining order or an interlocutory injunction to grant a mandatory injunction compelling the performance of an act in any case involving or growing out of any labor dispute as defined in the act. There is no corresponding provision in the House bill. The conference agreement omits the Senate provision.

Section 6 of the House bill provides that no officer or member of any association or organization, participating or interested in a labor dispute, shall be held responsible or liable in any United States court for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or authorization of, such acts, or of ratification, with actual knowledge, of such acts. The section further provides that the liability of any such association or organization for unlawful acts of its members shall be similarly limited. Under the corresponding provision of the Senate amendment (section 7), no officer or member of any association or organization, and no association or organization participating or interested in a labor dispute is to be held responsible or liable in a United States court for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents, except upon clear proof of actual participation in or authorization of such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge. The conference agreement adopts the Senate provision.

Section 7 (a) of the House bill, which deals with findings of fact necessary to be made by the court before a temporary or permanent injunction may be issued, prescribes as one of the classes of findings that unlawful acts have been threatened or committed and will be continued. The paragraph further provides that no injunction or restraining order shall be issued except against the person or persons, association, or organization making the threat or committing the unlawful act or authorizing or ratifying it after actual knowledge thereof.

The corresponding provision of the Senate amendment (sec. 8 (a)) requires a finding that unlawful acts have been threatened or committed, and will be committed or continued unless restrained, and omits the provision including associations and organizations within the exception.

The conference agreement requires a finding that unlawful acts have been threatened and will be committed unless restrained or have been committed and will be continued unless restrained, and includes associations and organizations, as does the House bill.

Under the House bill (second subdivision of sec. 7) notice of hearing must be given to the chief of those public officials of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed. Under the corresponding provision of the Senate amendment (second subdivision of sec. 8) notice of hearing must be given to the chief of those public officers of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed charged with the duty to protect the complainant's property. The conference agreement adopts the Senate provision except that "officials" is substituted for "officers."

The second subdivision of section 7 of the House bill expressly gives the court the power to fix the amount of the security in the undertaking filed by the complainant. There is no corresponding provision in the Senate amendment. The conference agreement adopts the provision of the House bill.

The third subdivision of section 7 of the House bill provides that the undertaking given by the complainant shall signify an agreement upon which a decree may be rendered upon a hearing to assess damages, of which hearing the complainant and surety shall have reasonable notice. The corresponding provision of the Senate amendment (third subdivision of sec. 8) contains no such provision with respect to hearing and notice. The conference agreement adopts the House provision.

The House bill (sec. 10) provides that, upon the request of any party to the proceedings, the court shall forthwith certify the entire record of the case, including a transcript of the evidence taken, to the circuit court of appeals for its review. The Senate amendment (sec. 11) provides that upon the request of any party to the proceedings and on his filing the usual bond for costs, the court shall forthwith certify as in ordinary cases the record of the case to the circuit court of appeals for its review. The conference agreement adopts the provisions of the Senate amendment.

The House bill (sec. 11) provides that, in cases arising under sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of this amendatory act in which a person is charged with criminal contempt of a court of the United States, the accused should enjoy a speedy public trial by jury. The corresponding provision of the Senate amendment (sec. 12) is broader in that it relates to all cases in which a person is charged with contempt in a court of the United States. The conference agreement applies only to cases arising under the act under consideration in which a person is charged with contempt in a court of the United States.

Section 12 of the House bill provides that the defendant in any proceeding for contempt of court may file a demand for the retirement of the judge sitting in the proceeding if the contempt arises from an attack upon the character or conduct of such judge and if the attack occurred otherwise than in open court. The corresponding provision of the Senate amendment (sec. 13) permits such demand if the contempt occurred elsewhere than in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision except that "attack" is substituted for "contempt."

The separability clause of the Senate amendment (sec. 15) is broader than the coresponding provision of the House bill (sec. 14) in that separability with regard to persons and circumstances is included. The conference agreement adopts the Senate provision.

HATTON W. SUMNERS, A. J. MONTAGUE, L. C. DYER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman state to the House wherein the conference report agreed upon differs in substance from the anti-injunction bill as it passed the House?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The conference report differs not materially from the bill as it passed the House. The bill as it went to the Senate, as it came from conference, incorporated section 6 of the Senate bill, which was not in the House bill. Section 6 dealt with the mandatory powers of the Federal court, operating under temporary injunction, and also the ancillary power. Since that provision has been eliminated in the last conference report and was not incorporated in the bill as it passed the House, that explanation will be sufficient, because it is out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if that is eliminated, there is nothing more to be said about it, but I wanted the gentleman to make that explanation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill as it comes out of conference does not in any way interfere with the existing padlock powers that are now exercised by our courts?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is understood.

Mr. BLANTON. It only has reference to labor disputes and no other question.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Well, it is a little broader than that. It affects injunctions in labor disputes and contempt proceedings growing out of what is known as an attack on the judge or court.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but it does not relate to other subjects or to the prohibition question.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is correct. Mr. LaGUARDIA. Only arising out of the act.

Mr. MICHENER. In substance the conference report agrees with the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In substance, that is correct.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the House bill went to the Senate. The Senate bill got lost over here and never did get back to the Senate. When the House bill went to the Senate, the Senate offered the Senate bill as it passed over there as one amendment to the House bill, and we considered that in connection with the House bill. As stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Sumners], outside of the elimination of a section which the Senate put on on the floor of the Senate, section 6, which had to do with mandatory injunctions, which was eliminated and is not now a part of the report, the only thing we had in controversy and only other change of consequence, I think the gentleman from Texas will agree, was in reference to contempts. The House provision provided for criminal contempts, that there should be a jury trial in such cases. We struck out the word "criminal," and a jury trial is now in order for contempt, civil or criminal.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That is, arising out of any action contemplated in the act.

Mr. DYER. Yes; we confined all issues to this act itself, and it does not apply to padlock injunctions or to anything

Mr. MICHENER. What I am interested in is what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] says. It is the striking out of the word "criminal," so that the act does not apply to criminal contempt only but to all contempts, which is a vastly different thing. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] assures us that the change made in the Senate refers only to labor disputes, in so far as that particular phase is concerned.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Cases arising under the act, which we passed. It is our section 11.

Mr. MICHENER. It would be a vastly different thing to strike out "criminal" and make the act apply to all con-

Mr. DYER. Oh, no. The conferees never had any such intention.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I suggest to the Members of the House that they be brief as possible, because I am here only under the assurance given to the gentleman in charge of the revenue bill that we would be very brief. The report filed in this case, except one word that is not properly printed, really discloses the status of this matter before the House. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill of 1932, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, not because the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and the then Under Secretary and present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, made recommendations which were counter to the proposed sales tax, no more than because the proposed sales tax is advocated by the distinguished publisher and publicist, William Randolph Hearst, do I oppose it, but because the principle and policy advocated by the former Secretary of the Treasury and the present Secretary of the Treasury is, as I believe, a better policy, based on sound enonomic and financial considerations, and I stand here to use my voice strongly in opposition to the imposition of a consumption tax at this time, or at any time, unless it is proven that the proposal of the Treasury Department, the recognized fiscal representative of the Government, is not sound economically and financially. I listened attentively to the explanation of the acting chairman of the committee in justification of the sales tax. At no time did he cite in his very lucid explanation of the proposed bill any serious objection to the proposals advocated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

As I understand, neither the present Secretary of the Treasury nor the former Secretary of the Treasury at any time has departed from his first recommendation, and that the policy he advocated is the better policy for this Government to follow. I have here the mimeographed copies of the original proposal under date of January 13, 1932, and the later proposal of February 16, and in no instance is the present Secretary of the Treasury departing from his original recommendation to Congress.

I read from page 10 of the original recommendation what the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, corroborated by the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, Accordingly I recommend that additional revenue be provided from the following sources-

An increase of one-sixth in the present rates on tobacco manufactures and products, except cigars.

Who is there here who does not justify the imposition of one-sixth of additional revenue on cigarettes and other characters of tobacco? The Secretary of the Treasury has not withdrawn at any time that recommendation.

An increase of 1 cent in the existing stamp tax upon sales or transfers of capital stock; extension of the present tax on admissions through the reduction of the present exemption to 40 cents.

I do not subscribe to that low level, and the committee has raised the exemption to 25 cents, and I question whether it should not be advanced a little higher than that. Certainly I would not subscribe to as low as 10 cents.

A tax on manufacturers' sales of automobiles, trucks, and accessories, at 5, 3, and 21/2 per cent, respectively.

This committee in its sales tax has brought in a recommendation only modifying that to the extent of levying 21/4 per cent on all; 3 per cent on trucks and 5 per cent on automobiles is what the Secretary of the Treasury recommends. This bill levies 21/4 per cent.

A stamp tax on conveyances of real estate of 50 cents for each $500 of value in excess of $100.

That goes back to the recommendation of war days, when we had a 50-cent stamp tax on conveyances, based on this same idea, and it was not any burdensome tax.

A tax of 5 per cent on manufacturers' sales of radio and phonograph equipment and accessories; a stamp tax of 2 cents on each check and draft.

That is what we had during the Spanish-American War and worked out satisfactorily at that time.

A tax on telephone, telegraph, cable, and radio messages of 5 cents for charges in the amount of 14 to 50 cents, and 10 cents for charges in amounts in excess of 50 cents.

That has been incorporated in the bill before us.

Then he also recommends increased postage rates from 2 cents to 3 cents.

I wish to subscribe to the postulate that we must, under all circumstances, balance the Budget, but only as a last and final resort am I willing in these times of industrial depression to put a consumption tax on the people generally.

I took the position before the assembling of Congress, when this question was being mooted, that I would favor an excise tax on luxuries and I would not favor a sales tax unless as a last resort.

I favor raising the postage from 2 cents to 3 cents, as other countries have done, in order to gain revenue.

How can any person on this side of the aisle or on that side of the aisle, with a deficit of $200,000,000 threatening us in the operation of the Postal Service, fail to support increasing the rates on postage?

Personally, as a stockholder in a small mercantile corporation which spends $90 a month in postage, I would be penalized more by increasing the postage than by the sales tax, which would be passed on in some instances, to the consumer, but I am here to subscribe to that policy, and also stand ready to vote for all these proposals recommended by the Treasury Department, including increased postage, because the conditions warrant it. If Canada had the courage to increase its postage from 2 cents to 3 cents, and that is the present rate, why do we not have the courage?

I am not taking my policy as to the financial program of this Government from any postal organization which, for some reason, wishes to keep down postal revenues when they have mounted, by reason of increasing salaries. We could, by increasing letter postage 1 cent, balance the Budget of the postal service, because it is running into the red to the extent of $200,000,000, and you are not warranted, under a sales tax, in passing it on to the consumers generally, because as a legislative anæsthetic it will not be consciously felt.

I agree with the chairman of the committee that in many instances the sales tax may be absorbed. Only yesterday

Additional, after the increase of the income taxes and | afternoon I received a letter from a large manufacturer of macaroni in my district setting forth the fact that although that company has reduced the salaries of the officers they had not reduced the wages of their employees, but if this sales tax is imposed they would be obliged to reduce wages. Why? Their product has a certain established price fixed for its sale, and they are in that condition economically that they can not afford to take the loss, and the only way they can recoup is to cut down the wages of their help. Now, they are not in a fortunate position like the Quaker Oats Co., which shows that their surplus this year is larger than that of last year. Such a concern might be able to absorb the sales tax, but not this company, and I dare say there are many similarly circumstanced.

I wish to call your attention to an instance where Canada with its general sales tax found it necessary to discourage the spending of money extravagantly by levying a high excise tax on luxuries, such as automobiles, jewelry, and the like. It was only temporary in character, but they had occasion to levy, in addition to their uniform sales tax, an additional excise tax on these articles.

I have waited long for some member of the Committee on Ways and Means to explain why they are continuing the 80 per cent set-off of all inheritance taxes collected that was adopted in 1924 and credited to the States. The supertax as provided here will raise only a few million dollars, but 80 per cent of the inheritance taxes that this Government receives will continue to be transferred to the States.

Time was in this body—and I was not here in 1924—when the National Government received its full quota of the national inheritance taxes; and the only reason, as I recall, why they allotted to the States 80 per cent was in order to prevent persons going down to such States as Florida. where they were trying to draw the tax dodgers of the country by promising them that they would not have any inheritance tax to pay or any income tax to pay should they change their residence. But that condition has passed. Why does not the Committee on Ways and Means come here and say, "We will appropriate a greater proportion of the 80 per cent set-off," if they do not want to wipe it off entirely?

We must view this question primarily from a national standpoint. Leave it to the States to get their amount of inheritance taxes; and if we would repeal the 80 per cent, or any portion of the 80 per cent credit, it would require no legislative enactment on the part of the States to collect their respective inheritance taxes.

Wisconsin does not grant any exemption on estate taxes above $15,000 to widows, and only $2,000 to lineal descendants. Here they are exempted up to $100,000-under this bill for the superinheritance tax, the tax begins at $50,000. Why does not the National Government take some greater portion of these inheritance taxes?

So we have the situation that the Ways and Means Committee has at no time shown that they can not get additional revenue from these and other sources. They have not advanced any reason why the recommendations of the Treasury Department have not been adopted, except perhaps, as we know, that large lobbies of interested special interests come down here and protest against this special interest being singled out for a high excise tax and advocate instead spreading it upon all consumers alike.

As a result you find the Representatives from those States where they have those special industries, which were relieved to the extent of the difference between 21/4 per cent and 5 per cent, rising here now in favor of this general sales tax.

Under the Constitution the right to originate revenue legislation is conferred upon the House of Representatives, which is directly responsive to the will of the people. The people expect us not to spread taxes over all but to carry out the fundamental principle which every true Democrat and every true Republican favors, namely, that luxuries, jewelry, and any other character of luxury shall bear a higher rate of taxation. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman live additional minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Great Britain and the United States are the two countries that have not levied a sales tax. Great Britain has higher income taxes and higher estate taxes than any other government in the world.

We should not adopt any policy, especially in these depressed times, which will weigh heavily upon the shoulders of the consuming class.

During the war, under the leadership of Mr. Claude Kitchin, with the Democrats in control, we scrutinized every means of taxation. Those were the days when the people were wearing silk shirts, when the workers in the factories were getting $15 and $20 a day; they were not then on a beer income, but they were on a champagne grade, but never once during those days did the Democrats advocate a general consumption tax that would be spread on the shoulders of every person in the country.

Yet now, when wages are reduced, and when the consumption power of the people is at the very minimum, you are asking this Congress for the first time to levy a tax which is going to weigh heavily upon the shoulders of the consuming class. How can any true disciple of the people justify such a tax?

If a person wants to buy a car costing $1,600 or $1,800, do you mean to say that $100 additional will deter him from purchasing that car? Of course not, because such a person is in a position to pay the additional tax. The same is true if a person wants to purchase a silver service, as I did for one of my former secretaries. At that time there was a special excise tax on silver services, and yet I did not object to the payment of the special tax because I was in a position to pay, and I gladly paid it. However, that is not true of a sales tax which covers all articles, because that is a tax which is spread over the entire consuming class.

If you should adopt such a tax you would find it odious to the people and you will be called to account for it. Your very certificates of election will be considered upon your decision in relation to this question, whether you are going to have the consuming class bear the burden or whether you are going to have these taxes paid in proportion to the ability to pay.

The Committee on Ways and Means has not shown at any time in this debate that it can not get adequate revenue from inheritances by cutting off the 80 per cent or reducing that percentage. They have not shown that they can not get $150,000,000 by increasing the rates of postage. They merely present to you a soothing legislative dose which they think will not be felt by the people but which will, in fact, increase the cost of living. It will not only increase the cost of living $600,000,000, the amount expected to be raised, but perhaps $1,000,000,000. I will protest against the imposition of such a tax until every avenue for raising taxes has been exhausted. The Committee on Ways and Means has not shown that it has.

Let us stick fast to the principle that we must balance our Budget, but balance it in a way which will not lay heavily upon the consuming class, unless all other avenues of taxation have been exhausted.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman has made an interesting and convincing argument, and in support of his contention that the Republican Party, as a party, has heretofore been opposed to the sales-tax policy, may I suggest that in 1921 the Senate Finance Committee held very extensive hearings with a view of establishing a general sales tax. Following the analysis and argument embodied in a treatise by Professor Seligman, the committee abandoned the plan entirely as impractical, unjust, and unwise, though the chairman, Senator Smoot, favored the adoption of the sales tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. That may be true. Let me say I hesitate to bring in the prohibition question in this revenue debate, but many of my people at home are sullen. They are law-abiding, but they can not understand why you should suffer the policy of allowing the Capones and other racketeers to get the revenue which rightfully belongs to the Government when there is within reach at least $300,000,000 by levying a tax on beer at the rate of $6 a barrel. That was the war-revenue rate charged at the close of the war on 2.75 per cent beer of alcoholic weight authorized by the President under the war powers of Congress. Then the Government received hundreds of millions from beer alone to meet the running expenses of the Government. Now the revenue is illicitly diverted to the pockets of the racketeers.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is admitted by Mr. Woodcock, the prohibition enforcement officer, that there are 38,000,000 barrels of beer being peddled around annually by hijackers, from which we get no revenue. Fifty million barrels of 2.75 per cent beer, which is acknowledged to be nonintoxicating, at $6 a barrel would raise $300,000,000. This mild beverage, nonintoxicating and within the power of Congress to authorize, is being denied to hundreds of thousands of temperate people because Congress is yielding to the fanatical prohibition intolerants. My people at home are wondering how this Congress can fail to adopt that means of taxation instead of resorting to this unwanted policy which will cost every family in the country an average of at least $10, $15, or $25 a year. When will the Congress get sanity on the drink question and supersede the evils of unregulated traffic of hootch, moonshine, and their ilk by permitting the manufacture of a mild beverage that most temperate people advo-

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it would appear that a clear majority of this House do not want to vote for the sales tax. We are told by the proponents of the measure and by the administration that we must vote for it because there is no other way in which the revenue necessary to balance the Budget can be raised. Such a statement is not true. No other acceptable method has been offered to the House, but another method does exist. I hope that the Ways and Means Committee will give heed to the suggestion I am making.

Strictly speaking, there is no deficit. The income contemplated by previous sessions of the Congress is sufficient to discharge all the obligations of the Government, but that income has not been collected. We are not really dealing with a deficit but with a shortage.

Let me offer a letter written to me by Andrew W. Mellon, former Secretary of the Treasury. This letter is dated December 7, 1931, and it deals with conditions of the actual present, not of the dimmed past nor of the uncertain future.

DECEMBER 7, 1931.

Hon. L. T. McFadden,

Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,

House of Representatives.

Dear Mr. Chairman: I have your letter of November 21, 1931, in which you request that I advise you concerning the number and total amount of the unpaid or disputed income or other tax cases remaining unsettled or now pending before the tax board of the Treasury.

The records maintained by the Bureau of Internal Revenue with respect to the cases awaiting hearings by the United States Board of Tax Appeals indicate that on October 31, 1931, there were pending before that body, or on appeal to circuit courts of appeals from decisions of the board, 19,444 appeals, and that the amount of proposed deficiency taxes involved was approximately $728,634,000. As to 221 cases the board had reached its decision, but the final order had not issued. In 644 cases the final order had issued, but the 6-month period permitted for appeal has not run. In 860 cases appeals had been filed with circuit courts. The number of cases which the board must decide is, therefore, 17,719.

order had not issued. In 644 cases the linal order had issued, but the 6-month period permitted for appeal has not run. In 860 cases appeals had been filed with circuit courts. The number of cases which the board must decide is, therefore, 17,719.

There are pending before the income tax unit in Washington approximately 16,400 cases, which involve about $174,000,000.

These cases are largely for current or late years. Most of the cases involve the tax year 1929, while the balance is for 1928 or prior years.

Although no exact figures are available as to the cases now pending before our field forces, it is probable that about $25,000,000 is involved in examinations under way at this time.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary of the Treasury. The total of the items enumerated by Mr. Mellon is $917,634,000—$300,000,000 more than the estimated revenue from the proposed sales tax. I am informed that the great number of the thousands of income-tax cases which are now enmeshed in the technicalities of appeal are in that position upon slender foundations. I am informed that many of the petitions were filed by taxpayers at the instance of their expert advisers in tax evasion for the sole purpose of keeping in their own bank accounts as long as possible the money that should rightfully be in the Federal Treasury.

Other governments do not have provision for loopholes in their income-tax legislation, and in this respect I am not unmindful of the attempt in this bill to correct this, but it does not go far enough. We have allowed ourselves to become enmeshed in this great shortage; we should find means of escaping from this trap—and the laying of new burdens on our taxpayers to carry the cost of past folly is not the way out.

If the courts and the Board of Tax Appeals are unable to deal rapidly with this mass of technicality, the Congress should at once furnish them with sufficient personnel to bring this almost criminal delay to an end. Most of this money belongs in the United States Treasury; never before have we needed money as we need it now. This money should be where it belongs; no effort should be spared that will put it at the service of the Government. It is not fair treatment to those of our citizens who have paid their honest taxes.

The taxpayers who owe this vast sum are for the most part in a position to make payment.

I urge that the Congress take steps to collect the taxes due under present laws before it passes new laws to be evaded.

Information has also been furnished to the Bureau of Internal Revenue that hundreds of millions of dollars of taxes have been evaded or avoided by wealthy taxpayers. For months past the bureau has been investigating this information, and while few final reports of individual instances have been completed, there is definite evidence that a vast system of tax evasion has been built up and is now functioning to the great detriment of the public revenues. I have kept in close personal touch with the progress of these investigations and am familiar with the conditions which exist.

I offer the following letter from Andrew W. Mellon, former Secretary of the Treasury, written under date of December 11, 1931:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, Washington, December 11, 1931.

Hon. Louis T. McFadden,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
My Dear Mr. McFadden: I have your letter of December 9, written at the suggestion of Mr. David A. Olson. I will see that Mr. Olson's suggestions, transmitted through you, are placed with the material that he furnished to the department directly, which, as I advised you, is now receiving consideration.

Yours very truly,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary of the Treasury.

It is yet too early to offer definite figures on the extent of the tax evasions upon which information has been furnished to the Bureau of Internal Revenue, but it is safe to say that the sum which could be recovered from that source and from the other conditions disclosed by Mr. Mellon's earlier letter would easily amount to at least twice the total estimated as the return from the proposed sales tax.

Mr. Chairman, revenue from past-due taxes is already due to the Government. It was in anticipation of their collection that we entered into our present and past obligations. There is no reason why the intention of the Congress, as expressed in legislation, should not be carried out. There is less than no reason why the already burdened plain people of the country should be called upon to pay for the tax evasions of the wealthy.

Collection of these past-due taxes is not a tax upon the straitened present nor upon the doubtful future; it is a tax upon the past. It does not handicap the recovery of American industry or the employment of American workmen or the income of American farmers. It clears the obstacles from the path of returning prosperity and offers to us the encouragement of an unmortgaged future.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue should at once be provided with whatever additional personnel is needed to expedite the investigation and early collection of these evaded taxes.

I realize that the collection of this vast volume of past-due taxes will not be a short or an easy undertaking; I realize, too, that the financial returns from it can not be estimated with the accuracy of amount and date which are necessary in providing for public obligations, and that certain and unfailing revenue must be provided for immediate use. The collections from past-due taxes can be used to retire the precipitate borrowings for which we have recently become liable. I understand that the Treasury needs this year, in addition to this tax bill, will require new borrowings in excess of $4,000,000,000.

There is available another means of providing immediately the revenue to maintain the Government and balance the Budget. This other way will also produce a sum much larger than will any proposed tax legislation now before the Congress, and again I direct the special attention of the members of the Ways and Means Committee.

Like the collection of overdue and evaded taxes which I have just laid before you, this other source of available revenue is again no burden upon the present or the future. It again offers us opportunity to charge the costs of our past folly against the profits of that folly, to tax the past for the debts of the past.

For the past 15 years we have been away from what was previously the normal basis of American life. We have departed from caution and foresight and the wisdom of our ancestors. We have subscribed to weird phantasies of economics, the most unbalanced of which was the once prevalent belief that prices would forever go up. During this strange interlude in our history we became convinced that we were living in an era of unprecedented and permanent prosperity. Three years ago the natural laws of economics reasserted themselves and taught us some things that we had forgotton. Among other things, the arithmetic of our delusion was remodeled; we have learned that 12 years of inflation plus 3 years of depression is the equivalent of 15 years of hard times.

Comparing ourselves to-day with what we were in 1917, we find that we have a vast burden of public and private debt now which we did not have then, that we have formed the ruinous public and private habit of living beyond our incomes, and that we have become so accustomed to extravagance that we see it as necessity.

We in this Chamber are facing the consequences of a period of unprecedented national and international folly. We can not meet these consequences by continuing the folly which gave them birth. Paying bills is a sober business; it would seem best to approach the problem in the sober frame of mind which prevailed in the United States before we departed from reason 15 years ago.

Our bills must be paid. No matter what other nations may discuss or do, the United States must pay in full every penny that it owes, without evasion and without whining. We have been lectured upon our duty to the world; it seems to me that we have no higher duty than to provide an example by paying in full what we owe to our creditors and to our people—thereby, perhaps, offering a model of national sobriety in an age when that once common quality is all too rare.

Many a man who drew high wages in the silk-shirt era is living in a hole under a sidewalk to-day. All of us are paying our share of the common penalty in greater or less degree of sacrifice, self-denial, and actual loss of cherished possessions.

The human portion of the United States is paying a full share for whatever portion of so-called prosperity it may have thought it once enjoyed. Nobody in his right mind is bitter about this; it is a part of the business of living, and the ability to take punishment in silence is one of the most important measures of manhood. What we are interested in now is the means by which our distress can be brought to an end and reasonable comfort restored to us once more. The American people have been and are now game under the lash of their troubles.

American corporations have a great opportunity to demonstrate that they are as willing to take their share of the payment for their profits of the boom era.

American corporations to-day have a total accumulated surplus of some $55,000,000,000. I am quoting this from Statistics of Income, prepared by the United States Treasury, page 25. Their cash loads the surviving banks of the country; they have more than $20,000,000,000 of cash on hand and in banks, according to the latest figures of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Ten billions of this surplus is invested in tax-exempt securities of the United States Government and its possessions and Territories or political subdivisions and securities issued under the farm loan act.

These great surpluses were accumulated out of excess profits; the very fact that the surpluses are so large is proof that the profits that they made were too large. These profits were made from the buying power of the American people. These surpluses compose a part of the funds that were used in the stock market in 1928 and 1929, being brokers' loans "for account of others."

Many of these corporations have discharged their workmen and slashed the dividends on their stocks which they sold to the public—and still the great surpluses remain untouched. They are of no benefit to the public as they stand; it is questionable if they are of any great benefit to the corporations which hold them.

Taxes should be based upon capacity to pay. In these huge surpluses exist a definitely evident capacity to pay.

I propose a tax of 4 per cent upon all surpluses of corporations. These accumulated profits would have paid taxes to a far greater amount if they had been distributed as dividends when they were earned. If they had been so distributed, we might not have come to the depths in which we find ourselves to-day. To tax them now is not a capital levy; it is but the collection of a postponed tax and a measure of equal justice to those who have paid their full taxes. [Applause.]

These corporation surpluses of $60,000,000,000 represent hoarding upon a far greater scale than the comparatively tiny sums which are said to be locked in safe-deposit boxes or in family socks. To release a part of these accumulations would be a great aid to the restoration of a prosperity which would swiftly produce profits far greater than the tax from a restored consumer buying power. [Applause.]

This is not confiscation. Four per cent of $60,000,000,000,000 would be a tax of $2,400,000,000—a great sum for the Federal Treasury in this emergency, but only seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the total capitalization of the corporations who now collectively hold this surplus.

I strongly urge that a 4 per cent tax be levied upon the undistributed surpluses of American corporations, and that cases now pending before the United States Board of Tax Appeals be hastened to conclusion and collection and that the Bureau of Internal Revenue be equipped to discover and collect all cases of tax fraud or evasion in which evidence can be obtained. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of some multimillionaires evading taxes. What multimillionaire in the United States is more interested, better informed, and better prepared to help along that line than our present Secretary of the Treasury? He is one who knows how himself; he does not need the help of a skilled lawyer to advise him, and he is the one who is advising some of our colleagues on our present tax bill, is not that so?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has answered his own question. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, as one of your representatives on the great Committee on Ways and Means I found myself in disagreement with the majority with regard to some matters carried in the committee report of sufficient importance, in my opinion, to bring to your attention. But before, if I may, going into these points of disagreement I wish to emphasize what I conceive to be the major principle which should govern our deliberations in this difficult and serious matter.

This major principle, Mr. Chairman, is that it is our duty to balance the Budget; not balance it at some future, some more convenient and easy time, but balance it at the earliest possible moment. I would not postpone the date of the balancing, because after the severe shocks to its confidence which the country has already suffered in the world of private business, I fear that another shock to its confidence in the national finances, would prove indescribably disastrous.

Leaving the serious aspect of the matter for the moment, I think Micawber, whom you will remember as a Dickens character, expressed the philosophy applicable to our situation. You will remember that once in a soliloquy over his own insolvent estate, he remarked:

Annual income, twenty pounds; annual expenditures, nineteen nineteen six; result happiness. Annual income, twenty pounds; annual expenditures, twenty pounds aught and six; result misery.

Now, in balancing the Budget for the coming fiscal year, you know that some $1,250,000,000 of additional revenue is called for. To what subjects of taxation can the Government look in its effort to gather this additional income? You have, first, the corporate incomes of the country running into the astounding figure of $129,000,000,000, but after the legal deductions are made only about $12,000,000,000 is left subject to taxation under our law, which is now subjected to 12 per cent tax and is to be increased to 13 per cent under the bill.

The next subject of taxation is individual incomes. They amount to some $25,000,000,000 on the basis of the experience of 1929, but when the deductions or exemptions were attended to, this $25,000,000,000 of individual income was reduced to the sum of $7,500,000,000, upon which present income taxes and increases proposed are based. All the above figures are round and for the year 1929. They are much reduced, unhappily, in the current year.

Another subject of taxation is estate values. Something over $4,000,000,000 is represented in the estate values passing from decedents as gratuities to those who are to become the beneficiaries. Under the present law, when the exemptions allowed are deducted from the $4,000,000,000 only

These, gentlemen, are the three subjects to which we should first look to recoup our falling Treasury incomes. I shall direct my attention to-day to one of them only, and that is the estate tax. Before approaching that subject, let me repeat a truism often referred to in this debate. It is, that while there are certain rules and canons of taxation, one standard ranks preeminent and is accepted as containing more wisdom than all the others, and that standard is that the burdens of government should be imposed upon its people, not in proportion to their needs, but in proportion to their ability to pay. [Applause.]

We were a very long time in the United States developing our institutions, particularly the constitutional power of this body, to such a point that that canon of taxation could be substantially applied. I am sure my Republican friends on the left will take no exception to a statement I am about to make—that the Democratic Party had to fight nearly a half a century to get the income-tax provision into the Constitution.

How far is this standard of just taxation, "ability to pay," realized in our system to-day? A cursory view of our methods of taxation shows that after 20 years only one-third of the revenue of the Government of the United States is secured under this standard of taxation. Two-thirds of the revenue are secured still by indirect taxation, condemned as less desirable by all public financiers whose works I have been able to consult on this subject.

Now we come, ladies and gentlemen, to the estate tax. What do we find the situation to be here?

Now, I hope I am not too presumptuous in saying that probably not one Member of Congress out of ten realizes the discriminations that are being practiced by the present law with regard to those who earn their income and pay an income tax, in comparison with those who receive, unearned by them, the benefits of the wealth transferred through the inheritance and testamentary laws. If you will have patience to hear a few mathematical details. I will be able to make that clear. You know that we have reduced the exemption until the highest one remaining of the income-tax benefits is $2,500. Ladies and gentlemen, the exemption of $100,000 is now allowed in the case of estates. The exemption on estates is thus forty times as great as the exemption ($2,500) of those who pay from earned incomes.

Please listen to some examples of this discrimination. under the bill. A railway engineman has an income of $2,500. If he is unmarried, he is taxed on $1,500. But the nephew of some decedent uncle, who has just left an estate of $100,000, receives $2,500 by gift or inheritance and pays no tax at all. Is this equality before the law? Another example: Some inventor or engineer awakes from the dreams of the night with a device or discovery to promote the common welfare and receives $100,000 reward for it. He must pay a tax of $26,770 or 27 per cent. But a beneficiary, the sole beneficiary, of some estate of $100,000 receives his $100,000, free of any tax at all. Who can deny the discrimination here? Who can justify it? The toiler must pay; the mere acquisitor need not. This exemption was formerly limited to $50,000. The present law raises it to $100,000, and this is the exemption carried in the present bill. It applies without regard to the human relations involved. A total stranger or a third cousin gets the benefit of just the same exemption as a widow with a family of children. Gentlemen, there is no principle on which such an exemption can be supported. It represents nothing more than the neglect of the legislative mind. None of the State's exemptions can be referred to in its support. In New York they have an exemption, but it is adapted to the human rela-

May I add that in New York State an exemption is first allowed of $20,000 from the estate tax in the case of a widow, $5,000 more in the case of each of her children, with a string of $5,000 exemptions for other relatives. The State legislature has handled the subject with a view to its human aspects. This body has gone blindly and granted a $100,000 exemption, whether it should go to a widow and a half dozen infant children or whether it goes as a mere gratuity to a total stranger.

The above discrimination raises a question of justice and principle more especially, but its significance to the Treasury, I admit, is not great. But I now come to the discrimination in the application of the rates themselves.

DISPARITY IN THE INCOME AND ESTATE RATES

But, Mr. Chairman, the discriminations, unhappily for the Treasury, do not end there. After allowing the disparate exemptions to both income and estate taxpayers another set of discriminations are unconsciously carried in the law and the bill. Reading the income and the estate tax rates you find that the rate begins in the low bracket at 2 per cent for both; that is, $1,000 of the net taxable would pay $20 under the bill, whether income or estate. (That is, the low brackets are 2 per cent in each case.) So, too, the highest rates are the same for income and estates, for there is a maximum rate of 40 per cent on incomes and a maximum rate of 40 per cent on estates.

But now, gentlemen, I call your attention to a discrimination which is not paralleled in the history of taxation. The maximum rate of 40 per cent is applied to incomes when they reach $100,000, but this 40 per cent is not applied to estates until they are one hundred times as great, until they reach $10,000,000. That is, in order to collect the 40 per cent maximum on estates the income benefits to the distributees must be one hundred times as great. I now insert a table, the data of which have been supplied by Mr. Parker and his staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

Note, gentlemen, that on the first $1,000 the income-tax payer pays $11.25 and the estate $12-that is, 1.13 per cent and 1.20 per cent, respectively. At $10,000 the income payment is $300, the estate is $120, about 21/2 to 1. When $20,000 is reached the disparity is nearly 6 to 1, the income paying $1,325 and the estate only $240. At $50,000 the income payment is $7,400, the estate $600, or 12 to 1. At $100,000 the sum of $26,700 is paid, as compared with $18,000, or over 14 to 1. At $1,000,000 the income pays $440,770 and the estate only $58,200. And at $10,000,000, where the nominal maxima of 40 per cent come together, the income pays $4,580,770 and the estate $1,624,000-that is, 16 per cent, or about one-third as much.

These discriminating disparities mean an abandonment of all just principles in taxation, I submit. But what, may I ask, do they mean to the Treasury in the worst peacetime exigency it has known for a century. Well, gentlemen, they mean that if only the same rates are applied to estates that are applied to incomes in this bill the yield will be increased from $255,324,000 to $969,440,450, an increase of $714.116.540.

I know you marvel at the enormity of this disparity. The computations are the work of the staff of experts of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and I now am presenting the table prepared by this official authority on the subject:

Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, Washington, March 16, 1932.

Hon. DAVID J. LEWIS,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
My Dear Congressman: In accordance with your request computations have been made of the amount of revenue that would be raised from the Federal estate tax by applying the income-tax rates of the revenue bill instead of the estate-tax rates car-ried in the bill and allowing an exemption of $50,000 instead of $100,000. Tables are attached showing the estimated yield from the estate tax if the income-tax rates were applied in comparison with the yield from the estate tax under the 1928 act and the revenue bill as proposed.

Very truly yours, L. H. PARKER, Chief of Staff.

You ask, naturally, why should there be such a disparity, why the beneficiaries of unearned, even if worthy, income should be preferred in this fashion. I think there could have been no conscious purpose to do so in the mind of Congress, because elsewhere in the act you do not find earned income discriminated against; you find it preferred, with a certain discount in its favor up to $12,000 in amount. The explanation of the disparity between the estate beneficiary getting $50,000 and paying $1,000 and the earned income taxpayer paying $7,750 on the same amount was not intended. My explanation is that the fixing of the point of application of the 40 per cent rate was a mere impulse of some one in charge of the subject. It could not have happened by comparison—the comparison is grotesque. Using a physical illustration, in the case of earned incomes the citizen pays his 40 per cent rate on a 1-story building, while in the case of unearned income, passing by force of the law, another citizen is not required to pay his 40 per cent rate until his structure reaches 100 stories. The consequence of the postponement of application of the 40 per cent tax in the case of estates to the $10,000,000 point, instead of applying it at $100,000, as in the case of incomes, is a loss to the Treasury of $714,000,000. It has done more to wreck the Treasury than any other cause.

I think I know, or can understand, the psychology which accounts for what I have characterized as a discrimination in taxation utterly not found elsewhere and unparalleled in history.

The approach to the subject may have been social in purpose and not the approach of a public financier desiring to secure revenues needed by the Government in a wise and just way. Pictures of millionaires are presented to the social reformer. Put the rates high on the great fortunes, he says. His rates are conceived and formulated perhaps in the rostrum. It is a picture, not a mathematical formula he is regarding. The idea of millions takes his mind to New York. He looks out at the sky line of the city of New York. What is the picture at once presented to his mind? It is a picture of towering sky scrapers, so when he looks out on this field of income and wealth in the United States he sees a picture of towering multimillionaires or billionaires. But let me say to you that New York is not a town of 100 stories, it is not a town of 50 stories, it is not a town of 10 stories. New York, taken all in all, is a 5-story town, and if the authorities of that city should think only of skyscrapers, without regard to the great body of its wealth, only bankruptcy could be waiting for the great metropolis.

And so it is in this field of income and wealth. There are skyscraper incomes and estates, but the great body of the income belongs to the middle classes, and it is to them the Government must look for support and sustenance.

These figures I have presented to you are phenomenal, I know. If they were my own I should hesitate, because of their great dimensions, to present them. I asked the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, which serves alike the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House as its official counselors in taxation and revenue, to give me a statement of what the revenue would be if the same rates were applied to estates as to individual incomes. Here is a table giving their report. Their answer is that if estates were taxed, even after allowing $50,000 exemption, at the same rates and in the same manner as individual incomes are taxed under this bill, an increase of revenue over that expected by this bill of $714,-000,000 would result; and that is after making allowances for the present payments back to the States, and also allowing for the revenue of $255,000,000 expected under this bill. A net increase would be available to the Treasury of $714,000,-000 if we would here apply the principle of equality in taxation to the unearned amounts going to beneficiaries by virtue of the law and in the same spirit of fairness and equality that we apply it to the earned individual income. [Applause.] And this can be done without changing the rates. This great difference arises not in the rates. It arises because of the deferred or postponed point at which the 40 per cent rate is applied to estates. The only change in the statute that is required is a shift of the 40 per cent rate in the case of estates to the $100,000 point where it is found in the case of individual earned income. The 2 per cent minimum rate and the 40 per cent maximum rates will remain unchanged.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Just to get clear what the gentleman is proposing, the gentleman is proposing an exemption of $50,000?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then over the exemption the gentleman would adopt the income-tax rates, with the same brackets?

Mr. LEWIS. The same brackets.

Mr. RAMSEYER. So that the 40 per cent would apply after you get over the $100,000, plus the exemption?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is up to $150,000, with the exemption?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Everything above $150,000 would be taxed 40 per cent?

Mr. LEWIS. Everything above $150,000 would be taxed just like incomes above $100,000.

What happens now is this, that by deferring the application of this 40 per cent rate to the ten million point in one case, whereas it is $100,000 in the other, that is an altitude one hundred times as great; the income-tax payer is paying at the rate of 45 per cent, and estates only paying 16 per cent.

Now, it would not seriously matter whether the estate exemption is $50,000 or $100,000, whether the point of application of the 40 per cent rate should be made $200,000 in the case of estates rather than $100,000; the difference in the resultant revenue would be negligible; but to defer this maximum 40 per cent rate in the case of estates to a point one hundred times as high as in the case of incomes explains why our estate revenue laws are practically barren of revenue.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I have followed the gentleman very closely. Has the gentleman considered the levying of such a rate where the estate consists of a factory or where the entire estate is in a going concern?

Mr. LEWIS. That condition is now involved and will obtain under any rate that is imposed. The estate tax is now imposed on the same subjects. It is a matter of degree. I doubt whether it is a serious matter of degree. The only question presented here is not a change of the rates but is whether the 40 per cent rate should be applied at the same place in the case of earned and unearned incomes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. Following the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia], for instance, in an estate that consists almost entirely of assets that are not readily convertible, what would be the effect of the gentleman's proposition on an estate of that kind?

Mr. LEWIS. Not different in character from that now obtaining. Whether the estate pays 16 per cent, as it does now under this discriminating policy, or whether it pays 45 per cent like incomes, the effect will be the same. The adjustment must take place, and I am told that plenty of time is allowed decedent estates for the adjustment of these particular matters.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. BARBOUR. Would it necessitate, in certain instances, almost the entire breaking up of the estate in order to pay these taxes?

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman is as well informed as I am, but I can not see that the principle is changed. You go to them for 16 per cent. Very well. You go to them for as much as you go to the others. Very well. The same subject matter is there; the same human; the same physical factors are involved.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement, and this question has just occurred to me.

Mr. LEWIS. I am assured by those acquainted with the subject that the Treasury has ample power to give them 1 year, 2 years, 3 years, any time that is necessary to properly adjust those situations. I will append an official statement on the subject.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am informed that in England they do not have a sales tax, but last year they collected in estate taxes $400,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS. That is, they collected $10 per capita in estate taxes and we collected $1.20 per capita here. What pauper fortunes we must have in America.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Last year the Treasury reported that the United States, with four times the aggregate wealth of England, collected $48,000,000 as against $400,000,000 in England.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; but this does not allow for the 80 per cent returned to the States.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And we call ourselves a democracy.

Mr. KELLER. Miscall.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, behold the fruits of discrimination in taxation! The fruit in this case is a loss of $714,-000,000 to the Treasury in the fiscal year 1933. And because of that departure from the accepted principles and equality in taxation, in what a situation are we involved? Let us abandon this discrimination and return to the just path of taxation, the standard of ability to pay, and firmly shun the field of indirect taxation. In my view there are two objections to this indirect taxation. The first is, as in the case of the sales tax, that the tax collected by the Government will not represent truly or fully the tax paid by the ultimate taxpayer. You can add 66 per cent to this $600,-000,000 of sales tax, as a pyramiding effect, unavoidable in view of the business margins naturally applied in distribution, before the consumer pays the tax. [Applause.] That figure of 66 is not just a mere rhetorical expression. It is the result of much study on the subject of margins.

There is another objection to indirect taxation—it is its low visibility. Low visibility is the touchstone of those seeking special privilege. I am afraid it presents a temptation under which candidates, like ourselves, are liable to prove less strong than we should be.

The sales tax has low visibility. The tariff is also a sales tax, has a low visibility, and witness the wreck of world commerce which these tariffs have helped to produce. [Applause.]

We have not reached such a state of perfection in democratic government, my friends, that we can afford to employ such hidden taxation, denying knowledge to those who pay as to what the tax is or as to its amount. Low visibility means extravagance and carelessness in government. It is true it prevents squealing. The animal may suffer; the animal may perish at length without any knowledge of the agencies which are inflicting the mortal wound upon it. [Applause.]

To what is this abandonment of equality in taxation and of direct taxation leading us? It is leading us straight into this sales-tax method of raising the revenue.

My friends, there are circumstances, I admit, under which indirect and invisible taxation may be justified. There are countries, perhaps even now, so poorly advanced that their citizens will not pay their debts to the Government, will not pay the taxes they should be willing to pay for the protection accorded them by the government.

I think of China at this moment. It may be possible that direct taxation is beyond the powers of government in China; yet we know that the incomparable importance of the preservation of government and of law and order would justify any kind of taxation that might be essential to maintain that incomparable value.

But let me ask this question this afternoon: Is the country of Washington another China? Are we Chinese law-makers? Will the citizen of this Republic be unwilling to pay his obligation for the protection of Government according to just standards? Is he going to ask that we resort to invisible methods of sustaining the Republic we all love? No; this is not China! We are not Chinese statesmen. I have the fullest confidence that when this subject is examined by Members of this body in a sufficiently thoughtful way we will recur to the old path of taxation, which means justice and equality to all concerned and ample revenue for our country. [Applause.]

TIME FOR ADJUSTMENT OF ESTATE TAXES

Under the Federal estate tax law the estate tax becomes due one year from the date of the decedent's death. However, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, upon showing of hardship, grant an extension of time for the payment of the tax, as follows:

In the case of the tax as reported by the executor, the commissioner may grant an extension of time not to exceed five years from the date the tax was due. This means that the estate may have a period of six years from date of decedent's death to pay the tax. And for the first six months of an extension no interest is charged. Therefore, for a period of 18 months from the time of decedent's death the Government collects no interest. After the first six months of the extension interest is charged at 6 per cent.

In the case of any additional tax found by the commissioner, he may grant an extension of the time for payment not to exceed two years from the date notice and demand is sent to the executor for payment of such additional tax. Interest at 6 per cent is charged for the entire period of the extension in the case of any additional tax found.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make an announcement. Quite a number of Republicans have expressed a desire for a conference in regard to this tax measure. Several have signed a petition, and I want to announce that there will be a conference of Republicans in this room to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Keller].

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois 15 minutes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have but one object in addressing this body, and that is to get clearly before us a series of ideas that will lead to the restoration of national income. If we can restore national income we will then have no difficulty whatever about revenue.

To enable me to express my ideas fully on this subject I want to call your attention to the fact that when we assembled here on the 7th day of December we were faced immediately with a whispering campaign telling us that if we knew the condition of the country we would be scared almost to death. I listened attentively to it. I abided by the decision of the men of long experience here. I had nothing to say. I doubted the wisdom of it, nevertheless, because it is my opinion that the people of my distrist and the people of every other district in America are just as good patriots, just as intelligent and just as capable of keeping their heads under difficulties as we are. I know that if the men and women in my district knew they were facing difficulties they would face them like full-grown men and full-grown women; that they would not under any conditions lose their heads, nor do foolish things. On the other hand, they would do what all men try to do under pressure, and that is to sit a little bit tighter, be a little bit stronger, a little more conservative than ordinary, and when a national matter is involved, a little more American than at any other time.

I, therefore, for the first 60 days did not attempt to impose myself upon the time of this body. On the 26th of February, I was accorded an unusual time for a new Member. I gave on that day my opinions as fully as possible, and in the Record of that date anyone who is interested in it will find the entire address. I am not going to repeat that to-day. I am going to try to speak very well within my time and much within it if I can.

But to enable me to get over to you the facts as I see them in America at the present time, it is necessary that I go back to the condition just before the stock panic occurred on the New York stock market on the 24th day of October, 1929, in order to call your attention to the fact that during the seven years in which we had currency stabilization we had no financial or economic difficulties. If the Congress had done its duty there would have been no panic with the subsequent depression.

I happen to know personally—and I speak entirely without partisanship, and I speak entirely impersonally—that the President of the United States was fully informed and thoroughly well warned of the impending danger, in the month of May, 1929. I call your attention to that fact for this reason: I do not know of a single thing the President did to avert that panic or to alleviate the result afterwards.

If it be not the fault of the President, let us not lay any fault at his door. If, on the other hand, there were means at his command, then we ought to call him to account for not attempting at least to prevent that catastrophe.

I listened with tremendous interest to the address of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to which I am going to refer a little later in my own talk, and that is as to the broker's loan, the effect of it, the reason for it, and what it has done to America. In other words, what I am driving at is this: If at the present time we have no means of averting panics, the first duty we owe to our country is to provide the means for averting panics hereafter, and we can not get away from that. It is, in my judgment, a disgrace to the intelligence of this country, the richest country on earth, with an abundant supply of everything, that we should have such poverty, distress, and destitution in this country at the present time. It can not be less than a disgrace to our intelligence, and our first duty is to see that this does not occur again.

Immediately after the crash on the New York stock market, the President called together at the White House a considerable number of the captains of industry. I read very carefully to see if there was one question asked or one statement made in that entire meeting setting forth the reason or the cause of that panic; and so far as I know, not a solitary man volunteered the answer, and so far as I know no one asked the reason. Yet this is exactly what ought to have been done first. The reason I am calling your attention to that fact is simply this: During the past 10 or 11 years, at least, we have been obeying, governmentally, the extremely wealthy men of this country, and doing their bidding and taking orders from them. It is a question whether we can go on doing that and survive. Frankly, I doubt it.

The President, very naturally, I presume, has attempted to distract attention from conditions as they are, but it is my duty and yours to face them.

The President pointed out, first, as his reason for the panic and the subsequent depression, the statement that there was overproduction. There could not have been overproduction in all 550 commodities, so that would not hold water, and because everybody knows that where there are millions of hungry people there is no such thing as overproduction of food; and where there are millions of naked people, there is no such thing as overproduction of clothing. When that would not stand up the President laid it on to the war. When that suggestion failed, he called attention to the conditions of panic in Europe. At the end of about a year and a half we are faced with the statement that it is a world-wide panic; that it is no fault of our own.

Oh, what a lovely thing it would be if we could sit back and say, "We did not do it; those fellows over in Europe did it; they brought on these bank failures; they put us all broke."

Of course, this would be an extremely easy way out of it. It may be an entirely honest way, but, certainly, not the intelligent way. What we ought to do and what we must do is to face the facts as they are.

I call your attention to the fact that in Europe there are just two main countries that are in depression at the present time and no more. They are Great Britain and Germany. All the rest of the countries of Europe, with the exception of the small Balkan States, are in very excellent condition economically, and there is no appreciable unemployment in any of them except the two large countries mentioned. The countries in Europe that are to-day doing much more than 50 per cent of the entire business of Europe are in splendid condition financially, and the proof of it lies just here.

I call your attention therefore to these facts: The total bank failures in Germany from October, 1929, to the most recent figures available on that subject amount to 25. Of that number 19 were private banks with very small capital, and only 6 of them would be classed as banks in this country.

Now, what about France? In France there were 23 bank failures.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. KELLER. Oh, surely.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman speaks of Germany; I am not familiar with the banking system in Germany, but do they not have, generally speaking, the chain system of banking so that it is impossible for one bank to fail if it belongs to a chain unless they all fail and the ones the gentleman has pointed out are just a few little private banks individually operated here and there?

Mr. KELLER. Let me say to the gentleman that I would prefer, of course, for the first 15 or 20 minutes of my talk to address my talk to the regular line of my argument and then come back and answer any questions that the gentleman may like. I would be glad, surely, to answer any question, so far as my knowledge goes.

I am only calling your attention to the facts, and the gentleman may make whatever application of them he pleases, of course, and I shall do the same.

But, in France there were 23 bank failures during the same period. Of the 23 bank failures of France, 8 were private banks of small or unknown capital. The actual number of bank failures in France therefore was 14.

Put together it means this, gentlemen, that in Germany there were 6 actual bank failures, and in France there were 14 actual bank failures in this period, and in Great Britain not a solitary one.

What about the United States during the same period? During this period in the United States we had 4,264 bank failures. The total amount involved in these failures in the United States was about $2,800,000,000.

If our panic is due to Europe—bank failures are certainly contagious.

I just call your attention to this, gentlemen, because we can not go on laying this condition to Europe and get anywhere with it. We can not solve it unless we bring it home where it belongs and face it like real men, and then see if we can not solve it. I invite every man of every party to assist in this, and I assure you that if the President of the United States to-morrow should announce a plan, a rational plan, to restore the national income, he would not have a better supporter in this body than I would be. I invite him to do this, and quit fooling around trying to lay this on the rest of the world. They are not guilty. It is our panic. We must pay for it, and we must solve it and prevent the return of panics.

The next thing I want to call your attention to is this. I agree with the speakers who have just preceded me, and with practically all other speakers that we have had, that if we can, we must balance the Budget; that is, make our income equal to our pay-out. This is a good thing to do, if we can do it rationally.

But if we balance this Budget with dollars worth 150 cents we will continue the betrayal of the American people which began in 1929 and has continued until this day.

And even if you do perpetrate this imposition upon the American public, I say to you that you can not balance the Budget by taxation. You can not balance the Budget, nor keep it balanced until you put men to work creating wealth.

We all understand fairly what an unfortunate position we are in, but I am not able to join those of my colleagues who, from the opening of Congress, have accepted a poverty complex for the United States. I have listened to a great many hopeless speeches. I hear almost every day that unless we balance the Budget we are bound for perdition, governmentally speaking, and a great many do not think we can balance the Budget anyway.

Unless this Congress soon recovers from its poverty complex it will be necessary for us to establish an official wailing wall against which to lean as we weep and howl. The fact is we are only poor because we are idle. We are screeching and screaming over a very ordinary business matter. Every business man has had the experience of losing money, that is, not making both ends meet during the year or a series of years. Under these conditions he has done a very natural thing. He borrowed money to tide himself over. He did not get excited at all. He first sat down very calmly and figured out why he had lost money and where; then he figured out how to make money the next year; when he had done that he borrowed what he needed and went ahead. Many a business man has found out that he was simply losing money because he was underfinanced. He did not weep and wail and tell the world how sure he was of going brokenot at all. He just made sure of getting plenty of money and doing business as it ought to be done for the next year and went in and won.

The United States is in the same position. We ran behind last year; we are sure to run behind this year; and we are told by our bookkeepers, the Secretaries to the President of the American Nation (Inc.), that unless we do better we are going to run behind next year. This Congress is the board of directors. It is our business to provide ways and means of making both ends meet. So far we have been so badly scared that we have entirely forgotten to find out why we lost so much of our national income. No committee has been appointed to investigate that most important matter of all, although I have been seeking the appointment of such a committee since the opening day of this Congress. So we are running rings around ourselves not knowing what caused it all. The President of the American Nation (Inc.) asked assistance for financial institutions to the extent of $2,000,000,000.

Now, this Congress, this board of directors, hurried behind closed doors to obey his insistent instructions. It did not seem to occur to anyone to suggest that any administration which would permit the business of the country to run so largely behind already, and facing the certainty of going much further behind this and next year, is not a safe adviser to follow. He did not tell us why this has all happened at all, and we did not ask him why. Just why we should rush through the measures for curing a condition suggested by an official who has so signally failed in preventing these misfortunes has been a matter of wonderment to me.

Now, I have set out this business of government purely as a business matter for the purpose of looking at it rationally. And what conclusion must we draw. First, that unless we take it for granted that we know why we are in this condition our first duty is to set about finding out why. When we actually find out why we are so poverty-stricken there will be no difficulty in prescribing the remedy. But pending that investigation—if it shall ever come—I am attempting by the process of elimination to discover at least the primary reasons for our present misfortune.

During this period of economic storm the citizens of this country gradually lost confidence in its financial institutions and started hoarding their money. The President finally called another conference. To discover why people were hoarding? No! That question, so easily answered, apparently was not discussed. Instead, they determined it was unpatriotic for the people to attempt to preserve what little wealth they still retained by hiding it.

The importance of cash is that in itself it bears no interest. So no one can really afford to hoard it except under those conditions where it is actually worth more while hoarded than when invested.

Now, to make the importance of that fact plain, let me call to your attention that when the credit stream is flowing free and undisturbed money, currency, actually draws no interest, so that every day a man carries a dollar uninvested he simply loses the interest on that dollar. Therefore the wise man carried as little cash as possible. But there is another feature of this that must be considered. The moment the panic struck Wall Street the intuition begotten by past experience caused him to grab his cash for purposes of security. He felt that disaster was abroad in the land. He began pinching dollars. Everybody did. The result was that the value of the dollar began going up. It increased from 103 cents up to 150 cents-47 cents in 26 months. The result was that the man who kept his currency entirely safe in a safe-deposit box or his pocket, or anywhere out of investment, out of use, made 21 per cent per annum on every dollar he kept out of use. Now, it ought to be perfectly plain to everyone that that is four times as much as the ordinary rate of interest. It therefore follows that as long as men can make more by not investing their money

On the other hand, let us suppose we should at once set about supplying an abundance of cash for all purposes at reasonable rates, so that anybody who can furnish security could have all the cash he needs at say 6 per cent. What result would necessarily follow. Certainly this: The man who had held onto his dollar while it increased 21 per cent per year would lose that whole gain unless he invested it. And that is exactly what a sane sensible man would do. As soon as he saw that money would be provided to meet all requirements to the full restoration of the price level of 1926-in short if he saw that his 150-cent dollar would drop rapidly to 100 cents he would buy something at once. Because he would know that object, that commodity would at once increase 33 1/3 per cent in value, so that when he desired to sell he could get a dollar and a half in 100-cent dollars. And that is exactly what will happen if we are wise enough to supply sufficient cash to meet all demands up to the price level of 1926—every commodity will come back to that price level; all property will return to the price of that year. We are making a mistake at the present time to talk credit because credit is so impaired that we must have an abundance of that thing which is the basis of credit-cash. Investment will not follow anything else until credit is fully restored, the credit stream fully reestablished and made permanent by an adequate guaranty to everyone who makes his money a part of the national life by pouring it unreservedly into the stream which makes commercial life exist.

The man who is or has been living on and consuming his savings is paying the highest possible capital levy. It is forced confiscation of his property. It is the very thing against which the rich people of this country stand in such holy terror in relation to their own large fortunes. If they are wise they will understand that a capital levy is just as fair for one as it is for another. And when a sufficient number of people have been impoverished by capital levies consuming their savings they will demand that the capital levy idea be extended to the capital of the rich also. Unless the rich want to face a capital levy for themselves they will do well to make such sacrifices of income as will protect their capital.

For the reason that I have here pointed out, it ought to be perfectly obvious that if we are as serious about the welfare of the American people as we claim, that if we are concerned about the honor of our Government and its credits, we should be no less concerned with our honor in balancing the Budget with honest dollars. We must not balance the Budget in 150-cent dollars; they are not honest collars. It is high treason to the debtor classes, and who is there to say that after nearly three years of the worst economic storm in our entire history the debtor class of our citizens is not the large class by many millions?

Now, I want to talk to you about the deficit. You would gather from the speeches made here from time to time that there never had been a deficit before in the United States. I would believe, if I had listened to the gentleman who preceded me that if we did not collect enough money to pay our debts this year, cur credit would be completely ruined, and we would never get over it.

Let us see about that. In my investigation I have not gone back of 1858. But in the 74 years from 1858 up to and including 1932 we have had 28 annual deficits. Now, get that, gentlemen. Some say, "Oh, well, some of those years were war years." Yes; there were 10 war years. But taking out the 10 war years, what do you have left? It leaves in the remaining 64 peace years, 18 annual deficits. In other words, taking the whole period of 74 years, we have had an annual deficit every 2 years and 8 months during that 74 years.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McGUGIN. During the period of deficits, have you any illustration, like the deficit of 1930, when one year was worse than the preceding year and reaching the staggering sum of $2,000,000,000?

Mr. KELLER. Yes; in 1917, 1918, and 1919 we had deficits of $1,700,000,000, $9,268,000,000, and $13,238,000,000.

Mr. McGUGIN. My question refers to peace time.

Mr. KELLER. I do not know that I have run that over.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Between 1892 and 1896, when Treasury notes were issued in the amount of $250,000,000, on February 21, 1893, how did the wealth and capital income compare with the present time?

Mr. KELLER. I have not made any comparisons along that line, but I am going to submit a list of deficits for the information of the House, and I am sure you will be glad to have it.

During the 10 war years we had a deficit all the time. During the 64 peace years we had deficits 18 years. During each administration period we had a little more than one year's deficit for each administration from 1858 to the present time.

Mr. RAGON. Can the gentleman furnish us with the information as to what our public indebtedness was at the time of these deficits?

Mr. KELLER. I will be very glad to work that out and bring it in here and put it in the Record if I can get the time. I have only one illustration for you now. The idea that it will ruin our credit if we do not immediately balance the Budget is fallacious.

Let us look at it. During 1917, 1918, and 1919 a total deficit of $24,256,000,000 in the three years' period.

Did that ruin our credit entirely? Did it swamp us? Did it make the people lose faith? On the contrary, it convinced the people that there is no such thing as ruining the credit of the United States as long as our indebtedness is only 6 or 7 per cent of our national wealth.

Mr. MICHENER. But at that time economic conditions were entirely different from what they are now. Market prices were higher, labor prices were higher, and now there is overproduction, and buying power is limited.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman for calling attention to the very thing that I am trying to make plain. We have got to restore those conditions. We must restore commodity prices. We must restore wages. We must put men to work. That would restore buying power, and nothing else will.

Mr. MICHENER. And the balancing of the Budget is the very thing that is necessary to do that.

Mr. KELLER. We did not balance it during those years. Mr. MICHENER. For the reason that I have suggested.

Mr. KELLER. Very well. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if we could stand a deficit of $24,000,000,000 plus

Mr. MICHENER. Does not the gentleman think, if he were a farmer-

Mr. KELLER. I happen to be.

Mr. MICHENER. And times are prosperous, that he can stand something in the way of a mortgage or expenditure that he can not stand when times are not prosperous?

Mr. KELLER. Let us bring back prosperous times. That is the only reason that I am talking. I want to bring back prosperity, and I want the gentleman to help me.

Mr. MICHENER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I will not interrupt any longer, but sit back and let the gentleman bring back prosperity.

Mr. KELLER. I can not do it if the gentleman and other gentlemen will not help me. I am appealing to you to help me to do it. I do not mean to say that we are not going to balance the Budget. We are, because it is a simple matter to do.

I want to call your attention to some more facts because I know this body likes plain, unadulterated facts, and I have been digging a little bit. You would get the idea that the income tax is just about to eat us all up, completely and entirely destroy the wealth of the United States. The truth of the matter about our income tax is simply this-that onehalf of the income which under the intent of the law should be paid into the Treasury is not being paid into the Treasury. Even under the betterments and improvements which these gentlemen are making in this law-and I compliment the committee on the splendid improvements they are making-you will find you will not even then get threequarters if you leave the loopholes as they are at the present time. As my friend from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] has so well said, it took us 50 years to get to the point where we had the right to tax a man according to his ability to pay. We have that right, and we have that responsibility in three years we ought not to be scared to death over | as well. There is a great abundance of wealth in this country that can afford to pay the taxes necessary to carry on this country as it cught to be carried on, and to the great advantage of wealth itself. At this point I call attention to the fact that industry is national. It acknowledges no State or sectional lines, but only national lines. If we are as wise as I hope we will be, we are going to be wise enough to recognize that industry is national and treat it nationally. We must do that.

> Those who think that our rich people are suffering from the payment of exorbitant income taxes are entirely wrong. I doubt whether there is any man in this assembly who knows better than I do the necessity of protecting wealth. But I also know the greater necessity of creating wealth constantly. Because it costs us $40,000,000,000 a year merely to exist in the United States at the present time, we have to produce enough beyond that to meet $10,000,-000,000 of interest payments and about $13,000,000,000 of governmental expenses over the country. Out of whatever we can get above that amount we can put by as savings for investment, for betterments, and to make progress that we all want to make and have the right to make. I have every desire in the world to protect the wealth that we have already amassed in the United States. But I have no desire and I will not consent to the unequal division of wealth that we have been compelled to accept during the past.

> Last summer I got to digging into things and I found out that a few wealthy people in the United States each year give very large amounts to science, to art, to education, to charity, and religion. I began to look it over, and I want to give you the summary here because I know that this will interest you. I was able to work it out only for nine years, beginning with the year 1921 and ending with the year 1929, both inclusive. I offer the table for insertion in the RECORD.

Excess tax over gifts.
Tax refunds during 9-year period.

Mr. PETTENGILL. What do those gifts include?

Mr. KELLER. They include all gifts. You will find all this in the World Almanac.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does that include gifts that might have been passed out by a parent to a member of the family?

Mr. KELLER. No; it does not include that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is important to get that. Mr. KELLER. Yes; that is important. It did not occur to me to do that. If the gentleman from Missouri will do that he will render a great service to this House.

Why am I calling attention to this tremendous giving? Am I opposed to these gifts? Certainly not. I am glad that America is rich enough to give men the opportunity of making wealth so that they can make such splendid gifts as these. I am devoutly thankful for such generosity, for such service to humanity.

The point I direct to your attention is simply this, that during the same years, so far as I have been able to count them, not over 300 people participated in giving these tremendous amounts, and in 1929 there were a little over 1,000,000 individual income-tax payers. How do the tax payments compare with the amount of these unadulterated gifts? I shall not bother you except to give you the summary. The total amount of gifts during those nine years amounted to $18,828,000,000, and there was paid in individual income tax during that time $7,410,000,000. Are the wealthy people of this country suffering from overtaxation when they give away nearly three times as much as they pay in taxes?

Total income—corporation, individual, estate, and gift taxes.

One more thing I want to call to your attention, and that is that for exactly the same years, 1921 to 1929, inclusive, the total corporation taxes amounted to $9,212,000,000. In other words, the gifts amounted to $2,300,000,000 more than the combined income taxes for both individuals and corporations and including the estate and gift taxes for the same 9-year period. There is no reason why the burden should not be placed upon the incomes of the wealthy so long as they are giving away more than all other taxes put

Are we going to be compelled to go before the people of this country, 8,000,000 of whom are crying for jobs, and thirty-five to forty million of their dependents in various stages of acute economic distress, and say to them, "It is the collective wisdom of this Congress that you shall bear an additional burden by paying a tax which the rich can not afford to pay "?

Are we to accept the advice of an administration that has been thoroughly discredited before the entire country and add to the burden which their economic abuses has put upon the backs of the wage and salaried classes of our citizens by adding a sales tax?

The people whom you are about to tax had no part in bringing about this havoc. When a succession of Congresses reduced the income tax time after time, making the reduction retroactive each time, it was not the people whom you are about to tax now who benefited. Who did benefit? Only those individuals and corporations whose income was sufficiently high to require a tax to be paid. When you stop to compare the small number making up this favored class with the great number that will be affected by the sales tax here proposed, the injustice becomes immediately apparent.

My colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden] has made a suggestion to you here this afternoon that I had intended making myself and that is that we already have a means immediately available for raising revenue in the tax deficiencies now pending before the Board of Tax Appeals.

Under the provisions of the law creating this Board of Tax Appeals it is a simple matter for the man or corporation who owes taxes to make money out of the Government by simply postponing payment of its taxes by appealing to this board.

Sufficient tax money is tied up in this litigation to raise one-half more than it is proposed to raise by the sales-tax provision of this bill from the rags and starvation of 8,000,-000 idle men.

Is the United States protected in this matter? It is not. No bond is required to insure the payment of the tax should the appellant fail to sustain his claim. It is a notorious fact that over one-third of this tax money is never collected after it is found to be due, and in many instances the appellant has gone bankrupt in the midst of the proceedings and the Government has lost it all.

The man whom this bill would require to pay a tax on his movie ticket has no such convenient body to stave it off.

Why not require these taxes to be paid now; then if the Board of Tax Appeals discovers that they have been wrongfully assessed, return such portions as may be due.

It has been said here, at least privately, that it is useless to put higher taxes on the wealthy of this country; that they will simply avoid paying it by some means or another. If I actually believed that, I could not reconcile the justice of our failure to tax the wealthy because they will attempt to avoid it, and then turn around and put a tax on the poor who can not avoid it.

This Congress should put the burden of taxation where it justly belongs-upon those who have sufficient wealth already made, upon those whose incomes even in times like these is comparatively unimpaired, and upon such other sources of revenue exclusive of the sales tax. The 1918 tax bill is full of sources that will work no hardship on any one.

If the Congress will do this I shall then favor a sales tax to raise the revenue that we need to put men to work, to restore the national income.

In 1928 and 1929 we earned $300,000,000 every day of the 300 days we worked in each of those years. It would therefore require but two days' work under those conditions to pay the deficit provided for by the sales tax proposed in this bill.

Now, I ask you gentlemen, how long will it take the 8,000,000 idle men and their families to pay their part of this deficit?

The jobless and the nearly jobless will have no hesitancy about accepting a sales tax if the money derived therefrom will be used to put men to work, to restore the national income. If they know that the money that they will pay in increased taxes will go to provide jobs for themselves and their idle buddies and not to ease the burden of taxation of the rich no Member of this House will need have any fear about voting for a sales tax. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGucin].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, the only thing I wish to state is prompted by the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Keller], who has just spoken, in which the gentleman cites the fact that there have been a limited number of bank failures in Germany, France, and England, while there have been thousands of bank failures in the United States, and offers that as proof that there has been no depression there as compared to the depression in America.

I can not speak for Germany. I can speak in the case of France and England. Some 14 years ago it was my good fortune to be in those two countries at the time when there were two or three million other young Americans there, and I never saw a bank in England or France which was not a chain bank. I have no recollection ever seeing a bank in France which was not the Bank of France or the Crédit Lyonnais. If the gentleman's argument that there have been no bank failures in France and England is any information which would guide the American people in the banking business, it would be that the American people should go into the chain-banking business. That is something which I detest and which I hope my country never does. Chain banking will keep all banks open or they will all go broke, one or the other, but a chain bank will destroy individual credit. No one ever heard of a French farmer borrowing a dollar from the Bank of France. No one ever heard of the ordinary French merchant borrowing a dollar from the Bank of France. I understand that the same thing is true in England; the small individual merchant never borrows money from the Bank of England and the individual farmer never borrows money from the Bank of England.

Perhaps we can not maintain the banking structure and give credit to the farmers and individual business men. I do not want to make that concession.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield. Mr. MANLOVE. Where does the farmer and the small merchant go to get a loan?

Mr. McGUGIN. In France and England?

Mr. MANLOVE. Yes. Mr. McGUGIN. They do not borrow any money. They never get a chance to borrow any money from a bank. Credit for individuals is unknown.

Mr. MANLOVE. I feel very sympathetic toward them. I have been in the same condition many times.

Mr. McGUGIN. Perhaps that would be a good condition for our country. I make this suggestion only because I did not want the gentleman's remarks to be construed as meaning that they have a sounder banking system in those countries than we have in ours, unless we are willing to go a step farther and give up the principle of private credit.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back any time I may have. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas yields back two minutes.

15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, during the past week or more we have heard some very frank statements as to certain provisions of the tax bill that is now before us. The frankness of those statements extended even to the members of the Ways and Means Committee who brought this bill into the

At the outset I want to assure you that the members of this committee are not laboring under any illusion as to the gravity of the proposition of presenting a tax bill in which is included a general sales or manufacturers' tax. I want to assure you also that with the possible exception of two or three members of the committee, and I think none of them on the Democratic side of the committee, the membership is in agreement with all of you who have spoken in opposition to that particular feature of the tax bill, that a sales tax is always odious.

Speaking personally, I have always been opposed to a sales tax. I am opposed to it now, and I am opposed to it on principle, if there be any principle underlying this system of taxation, and nothing short of dire necessity could drive me to support such a plan of taxation.

In listening to the discussion one would think that perhaps that is the only source of revenue included in this tax bill. Statements have frequently been made that taxes should be levied in accordance with the ability to pay, and that this committee should have brought in a tax bill levying the necessary increased taxes upon the incomes of individuals and corporations, and upon estates and inheritances. As you listen to the speeches in opposition to this tax bill you would think that the committee had been derelict in its duty in not first resorting to those sources of

I want to call attention to the fact that the very first work the committee did after listening for six or seven weeks to hearings before the committee was to see how much revenue could be raised from the income taxes and from the estate and gift taxes. We pressed to what we thought was the very limit of productive revenue from those sources before we even considered any other source of revenue to make up the deficit in the Treasury which is now staring us in the face. We increased income surtaxes on individuals 100 per cent in all brackets from $10,000 up and made the maximum tax applicable at $100,000, after allowing an exemption on the first $10,000. The result is that taxable incomes above $100,000 bear a normal tax of 6 per cent and a surtax of 40 per cent, making a total tax of 46 per cent. We increased the corporation tax from 12 per cent to 13 per cent, and it was the unanimous opinion of the committee, as far as I recall, that that was as much additional burden as we could place upon the corporations of this country in the present economic conditions.

We then took up the estate and gift taxes, and we raised the estate taxes from a maximum of 20 per cent to a maximum of 40 per cent. That made an even 100 per cent increase upon the estate tax, beginning at the point of $100,000 and graduated so that the maximum tax would be applicable on net estates of $10,000,000 and above. Then to protect this estate tax and to be sure, as nearly as it was possible to be sure, that there would be no evasion in the matter of the payment of estate taxes, we recommended a gift tax, with a maximum rate of 30 per cent, which paralleled the brackets of the estate tax.

Now, you may wonder why we did not make the gift-tax rates the same as those of the estate tax. You will bear in mind, however, that the primary purpose of the gift tax is the protection of the estate tax, so it was not thought desirable-and I am sure you will agree with the committee on that point—to so arrange the rate under the gift tax as to absolutely discourage the distribution or division of estates during the lifetime of the owners.

It is a commendable thing, of course, in many instances, and in most instances, that these large estates be broken up during the lifetime of the owner, and by making the maximum rate 30 per cent instead of 40 per cent, as in the case

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself | of the inheritance tax, we have provided in the gift tax itself a source of revenue to be paid within the lifetime of the owner of the estate; whereas if you make the maximum rate of the gift tax 40 per cent, the same as the maximum rate on the estate tax, there would be no inducement to divide these large estates during the lifetime of the owner, as he would pay exactly the same rate of taxation as the estate would pay after the death of the owner. Hence we expect to get some revenue from that source, and at the same time protect the estate tax.

I want to repeat again that the first work the committee did was to go to the sources of income taxes, both corporate and individual, and to the inheritance, estate, and gift taxes in order that we might place the heaviest burden possible on wealth and levy taxes in accordance with the ability to pay, before we resorted or began to look around to see where we could raise other revenue to supplement that which it was expected to receive from these sources, and in order to take care of the deficit in the Treasury.

But sitting here and listening to these speeches in opposition to this bill I rather got the idea that this Congress had made an egregious mistake in selecting for service on the Ways and Means Committee, from both sides of the aisle, a bunch of the most incompetent men in the whole

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. I will be glad to testify that I think the committee is made up of as brainy men as ever constituted any committee in Congress.

Mr. HILL of Washington. I thank the gentleman very much. We do not claim superknowledge, but we do claim for ourselves sincerity of purpose. The responsibility was ours. It is easy to criticize. I know, for I have occupied the position of critic when the responsibility was on the other man. It is a much more difficult thing to sit in the seat of responsibility and measure up to the duty which is placed upon you by reason of being placed in that seat of respon-

I want to say to you that whether the tax bill that has been brought in here is a wise one or whether it is a vicious one, this committee brought to bear upon it all the sincerity, all the ability, and all of the investigational work which was available to it in order to bring in the best possible bill under the economic conditions prevailing, for the purpose of balancing the Budget, in order that the credit of this great Nation might be saved.

I want to say before I get away from that point that after we had increased the estate tax, the individual income tax. and the inheritance tax 100 per cent, and after we had placed in the bill a gift tax carrying a maximum rate of 30 per cent, and after we had increased the corporation tax from 12 to 13 per cent—these being the highest rates in the judgment of the committee that would be productive of the greatest amount of revenue-we found that from those sources there could be raised by way of increases over the present set-up in the existing tax law only $112,000,000 by the increase of the individual income tax, $21,000,000 from the increase of corporation tax, $35,000,000 from the estate tax, and with the estimate of the gift tax left out of the picture, leaving a deficit still remaining of more than $1,-000,000,000. After recommending certain new special excise taxes and without disturbing existing excise taxes, the existing customs duties and miscellaneous internal revenues, we still had a deficit of something like $600,000,000.

It was evident to the committee, as it must be evident to you, that we first exhausted all of the resources for placing the burden of the tax on wealth so far as additional revenues were concerned, and that we had to go somewhere else to get this additional $600,000,000.

The Treasury Department submitted with its recommendations for this additional money a certain selected list of commodities, with a proposal to levy high excise rates upon them to make up this $600,000,000. You are familiar with the items. Gasoline was one; automobiles, trucks, and accessories; a stamp tax on checks; an increase in the postal rates; and perhaps one or two others which I do not now recall.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman add to that list listeners on radios?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes; radio, telegraph and telephone, admission taxes, and a very material increase in the excise tax on tobacco. I believe I have named about all of them. Anyway, it is immaterial as to a complete list.

What happened? At least 20 per cent of the membership of this House came before the committee, representing constituents back home, and protested from one end of the list to the other every single item included in the recommendations of the Treasury.

It was proposed to levy 1 cent a gallon on gasoline, and it was pointed out to the committee that this commodity was already bearing a very high tax by reason of State levies, ranging from 2 cents to 5 and 7 cents a gallon, and it was further represented to the committee that it was unthinkable to place an additional burden upon this commodity.

Not only did the Members of Congress come before the committee, but we had delegations representing the various industries appearing by droves and making out their case and showing that in the present depressed condition which obtains and in the struggle for life of their industries they simply could not stand up under the additional burdens which these high excise taxes would impose upon them. They made out their case; and in practically every instance when a witness came before the committee protesting against the levy of a tax on his particular industry, the chairman of the committee or some other member of the committee would ask him what constructive suggestions he might have as to the raising of this revenue. Some of them offered suggestions, but most of them threw up their hands in despair and were simply content to protest a tax upon their own industry.

The committee came to the conclusion it could not afford, under present economic conditions, to pick out a few of the outstanding industries of the country and levy a high excise tax upon them simply because the tax might be easy of collection. They felt, as I am sure you feel, that it would be an unfair discrimination against these particular industries pointed out and selected and recommended for taxation.

So the committee was right up against a blank wall. Here was the Treasury of the United States in default in the amount of $903,000,000 for the fiscal year 1931, with an accumulating deficit of $2,240,000,000 for the fiscal year 1932, making an accumulated deficit over a period of two fiscal years of over $3,000,000,000, with the prospect and the almost certainty that if something should not be done to bring more revenue into the Treasury, the deficit would amount to four and a half billion dollars or probably $5,000,000,000 by the end of the fiscal year 1933.

This, gentlemen of the committee, was the condition with which the committee was confronted, and the committee had the great responsibility of meeting this problem. I know how it wrung the heart of every man on that committee, because I know how it wrung my own heart, to agree to the recommendation of a general sales tax. I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it because of the great burden it lays upon the masses of the people regardless of their ability to pay, and yet we had to balance that idea; we had to balance our notions about that particular source of revenue with the proposition of whether or not this Government should be permitted to lose its credit, whether or not we should permit the Treasury to become so depleted and deficits to so pile up as to impair the credit of the only institution in this country to-day that has any credit.

We were not unmindful in approaching this proposition of levying a general sales tax of the possible necessity of enlarging the political cemetery in the event we should bring in this recommendation, but we felt that the credit of this Nation must be preserved and that the people of this country are patriotic enough to undergo an additional burden for a temporary period of time to preserve that credit. [Applause.] I have that much faith in the people of this country.

We did not put this recommendation in here as a piece of permanent legislation. We placed it here with a time limit, and it is to expire on June 30, 1934. To continue it beyond that date will require affirmative action by Congress and approval of the President, and yet you hear men stand up on this floor and say that this is a permanent proposition, that once you get it upon the statute books you will never get it off. Are you losing confidence in yourselves?

I want to say to you that there is not a member on this committee who recommended this tax against his will, against his desire, against his ideas of taxation with respect to this particular source of revenue, who figured for one moment that this would be a permanent part of the revenue law of this country. Hence we fixed it so that it will die by limitation of time, and that is exactly what will happen. If necessity exists for continuing it for another temporary period of time or for all time to come, this will require affirmative action by this Congress and approval of the President.

Now, is it necessary to balance the Budget? It has been rather interesting to sit here through this week of debate and hear the different turns which the opponents of this measure have taken as the debate has proceeded. In the early part of the debate practically every Member who spoke against the bill acknowledged that it was necessary to balance the Budget, but when they came face to face with the facts of how to balance the Budget, and when they began to look around for sources of revenue other than those recommended by the committee and found the difficulty that confronted the committee itself in its exploration of these different sources of revenue, then the debate veered round from the necessity of balancing the Budget, and they said it is not necessary to balance the Budget.

Of course, if you take the position that it is not necessary to balance the Budget, you can strike out the general sales tax and any other sales tax in the revenue law. But if you believe, as this committee believes and as I think the economists of the country believe, that the security of the country depends upon balancing the Budget for the year 1933, then you must resort to some kind of a sales tax to effect that balance.

Whether you take the recommendation of the committee for a manufacturers' tax or a sales tax—and I am calling it a sales tax, for that is what it is, although you call it an excise tax in the bill—whether you take that recommendation or whether you take the recommendation of our friend from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] and select certain commodities upon which to levy an excise tax, or whether you take the recommendations of the Treasury, which are in large part like the recommendations of the gentleman from New York, you must levy a sales tax.

As I said in the beginning, the sales-tax proposition is just as odious to me as it is to you. If I could see any way out of it, I would not vote for a sales tax. But when we strip this problem of its covering, when we take away the camouflage, if you please, you will find the consumers of the country are paying all the tax to-day.

You know it is one of the favorite games of men of financial power who control governments and administrations, and frequently control the Congress, to exert the full power of their influence to pass the burden of taxation on to the backs of the masses of the people. And in the main they have been successful.

If I had it in my power I would place the burden on those who are able to pay; I would place the burden of taxation where it would not be taxing the necessities of life. [Applause.] I would shift the burden from the poverty stricken of the country and place it on the rich, on the wealth of the country. [Applause.]

But whether we levy the tax on incomes or levy the taxes upon inheritances or by excise taxes upon certain specific commodities, the consumer pays. The consumer does not pay the tax on incomes, but the consumer pays the income upon which the taxes are levied.

Now, take the revenue as it stands to-day, as it comes into the Treasury, 50.5 per cent of the revenue coming into the Federal Treasury are sales tax or consumers' tax; and when you add this $595,000,000 in this bill, you will add another 17 per cent, and you will have 67½ per cent of consumers' tax, not counting the consumers' contribution to the incomes upon which income taxes are paid.

I am not holding anything back; I am trying to discuss the issue as the committee sees it. I am not trying to sugar-coat the pill that the country must take when we raise revenue at this time. You are confronted with the proposition that the people of the country must pay the taxes, whether in the form of excise taxes, whether in the form of consumers' taxes, or whether in the form of taxes on income, or great estates which are able to pay—it is all paid by the consumer.

As pointed out by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Huddleston] the other day, about one-tenth of the increased price on tariff-protected commodities goes into the Treasury and the other nine-tenths go into the pockets of the manufacturers. As between the tariff tax and a general sales tax, the latter is really preferable from the standpoint of the people, because the total of the sales tax goes into the Treasury of the United States. I am not saying that in support of a general sales tax; but since the matter was thoroughly discussed I felt as if emphasis might be laid upon that one point.

What about the credit of the country? Reference has been had here to the issuance of bonds in war time to the amount of $22,000,000,000 or $23,000,000,000 in the course of only a few years, and they say that that did not affect the credit of the country. I say it did. I recall when the great campaign was on to sell to the people bonds in denominations of $50 and $100 and larger amounts, how the people responded from a sense of patriotic duty, how they went to the banks, most of them to borrow money with which to pay for these bonds, paying the bank from 8 to 10 per cent out in my country and taking the bond at 4 or probably 41/4 per cent. Then, after buying these bonds and holding them for a short time, until unable to hold them any longer, they found the bonds had dropped down in the market to 85 cents on the dollar and they had to sell them at a sacrifice of 15 per cent of the principal paid. The common people of this country, the people who responded to that campaign, bought those bonds and lost three or four billions of dollars in depreciation of the bonds, not counting the difference in the interest they had to pay to the bank and that which the bonds themselves bore. And to-day the credit of the Government is impaired, as you will readily see by examining the bond market in any of the daily papers, and only through the confidence which this bill gave and the promise to balance the Budget has that bond market been boosted upward in the last few days. Up until a month ago there was not a dollar of commercial credit in my district, and there is in that district one of the richest producing fruit sections of the entire world. We have an investment there of three-quarters of a billion dollars; and men, many of them worth net $75,000, who needed money with which to carry forward their crops and farming operations for the present season, who heretofore had secured credit from the banks or through the marketing agencies that handle their products, could not get a dollar of credit.

They came to Washington by committees and they wrote letters and sent telegrams pleading "for God's sake help us to get some credit to protect our crops so that we will not lose everything on earth." There was not a dollar of commercial credit. That is not an exaggeration. The only credit they have now is coming through the money furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, through the liberalization of loans and rediscounts under the Glass-Steagall bill, through the pitiful sum of $50,000,000 allocated to the Department of Agriculture for direct loans to farmers, and through the intermediate credit banks—all Government agencies; and if it were not for the credit of the United States backing those operations, the people in my country would to-day be prostrate under this economic condition; they could not move a wheel; their property, valued in the hundreds of millions of dollars, would go rack and ruin; and the savings of a lifetime, the fruits of years of successful business operations, would be swept away. The only credit there is to-day is the Government credit. Are you going to destroy it? Is it necessary to balance the Budget? My God, do not let the whole thing crash around our ears.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. I have heard various speakers—I believe, also the one who just preceded the gentleman—state that in times past we had not suffered from a failure to balance the Budget. I am wondering if there ever was a time when we owed quite so much money and had such a large deficit and so poor a return of revenue as we have at this time?

Mr. HILL of Washington. This condition to-day is unparalleled in the history of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am interested in the gentleman's statement that this is an unparalleled condition. I remind the gentleman that the gift and estate tax is nothing like as high in this bill as they were after the World War. Why did not the committee raise it to what it was after the war?

Mr. HILL of Washington. The gentleman is in error there.

Mr. RAGON. I can answer the reason why we did not do it. We did not want to fix it so that a man would be precluded from making gifts during his lifetime and would take over tax-exempt securities and things like that. As chairman of the subcommittee who prepared that, I stood where the gentleman does until I was convinced by men in a position to know, that this was the better way to fix it.

Mr. HILL of Washington. The highest rate of estate taxes heretofore has been 25 per cent. We have raised it to 40 per cent, which is 60 per cent higher than it ever has been before.

Mr. DIES. And does the gentleman think that you could raise it to 60 per cent and raise the gift tax proportionately, and have the gift tax less than the estate tax?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I have no compunction against

Mr. DIES. Is it not a fact that it has been conservatively estimated that this Government could, in the course of a reasonable time, get a revenue of approximately $1,800,-000,000 from the estate tax, that $9,000,000,000 devolve in this country every year, and if we levied proportionately with what England and other countries do by way of estate taxes, we would tap a great source of revenue without having to take it from the masses of the people?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I am very much in sympathy with the idea of taking a big hunk out of estates in the form of taxes. I do not know whether we want to go to the point that Great Britain has gone, but I am perfectly willing to go a long, long way. However, that is not a ready producer of income. It takes a period of 18 months under existing law before you can get settlements of these estates, and we need money now. If you can fix that estate tax or any other tax that will take the burden off the poor people of this country and produce the revenue in the future, I shall be glad to go along with the gentleman and will help to do it.

Now, I want to say in conclusion that this committee was in a veritable Gethsemane for eight weeks trying to work out a measure that would not be so burdensome as to crush the last ounce of strength out of the people of this country. You can hardly realize the distress that came to us in trying to find different sources of revenue, and as we would approach one after the other, see them disappear and vanish from view. We did not want to levy this tax, and yet, in the interest of the people of this country, we must save the credit of this Government, and only that consid-vote for a general sales tax. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CRAIL].

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I was on the floor discussing a feature of this bill, the excise tax on the importation of petroleum, and my friend the distinguished Member from Maine asked me to yield, which I did, and then the gentleman stated that this excise tax on oil would inure to the benefit of the major oil companies and not to the benefit of the independent oil companies and of the American people generally, as I had claimed. My argument was that the very life of the industry and the existence of the independent oil producer depend upon some help from Congress along the line provided for in the bill which is now before us. The statement of my friend from Maine got across the idea that the major oil companies, who are the importers of this cheap oil, duty free, from South America, are in favor of this excise tax on oil and gasoline and that the independent producers, the little fellows, should be against it. I answered that argument as best I could on yesterday, but this morning there was handed to me convincing proof that these major oil companies, the importing companies, are flooding the Members of Congress with telegrams protesting against the enactment of this excise tax on petroleum, and that the major oil companies are paying the telegraph companies to send in these protests, and that they are soliciting the names of employees and the members of their families and even minor children to use in these telegrams in an effort to convince the Members of both Houses of Congress that the excise tax on petroleum proposed in the bill before us is iniquitous and that the public is making a vigorous protest against it.

I have evidence in my pocket that one of these major oil companies in one city alone presented to the Postal Telegraph Co. 2,000 names, nearly all of which have been found to be employees and the members of their families and their minor children, and directed that company to send telegrams to Members of Congress protesting against this excise tax on petroleum, and that this company paid for them, and that the major oil companies are carrying on a campaign against the excise tax on petroleum and its products as provided for in this bill and that these major oil companies are not for it, as claimed by the gentleman from Maine, but are against it and are strenuously working against it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have a sympathy with those Members of Congress who are opposed to the sales-tax features of this bill, as perhaps no other Member has. For a great many years I have opposed it most strenuously as an incorrect method of taxation, a method of taxation which might relieve, ultimately, the big income taxpayers of a part of the burden they ought to have.

I have continued that vigorous opposition to the sales tax right up until last October, when I was more opposed to it than ever before, and when I refused to join a party of Members of Congress who were going to Canada for the purpose of studying the sales tax, because I was against it. I was confident that I knew all about it and that whatever happened I was going to continue my opposition and find some other way of raising the revenues that this Government may need, not only now but at all times in the future.

Then these hearings commenced, and then there commenced our study of this bill. The Treasury propositions did not present a manufacturers' sales-tax method of making up this deficit. In fact, when we commenced the hearings we did not know what the deficit was, and as the hearings proceeded every industry affected by the Treasury suggestions came and made an absolutely air-tight defense. There was not any question about their defense. I can say, eration would ever force me or drive me or induce me to I think, without fear of contradiction, that everyone of the 25 members of the Ways and Means Committee, without any exception on either side, was opposed to this tax when the hearings commenced. Every speech in opposition to this bill—and we heard them all, and it took over a month to do it, and we worked overtime to do it-every speech in its last analysis amounted to this: "Why single us out? We know you have got to have money, but why should we six or seven industries which the Treasury has suggested pay it all? We do not object to paying our share, but why should we pay all of it?"

As the debate proceeded and we took over 1,000 pages of testimony the equities of those industries singled out for this tax attack appealed to every member of the committee, and we decided to broaden the base to make it apply to every industry and bear as lightly on each industry in this country as it possibly could bear.

Twenty-four of the twenty-five members of the Ways and Means Committee still adhere to that opinion. One member has a different opinion and he thinks that we can pay off this deficit in some other way. He has reached that conclusion from hearing the same evidence. He is a conscientious gentleman. He is honest in his opinions. He may be right. He heard the same evidence we heard, but 24 members of that committee can not agree with him; that is all. On that jury there are 24 stubborn men; otherwise we could have brought in a unanimous verdict.

That is the reason why we are not unammously supporting this bill.

There seems to be tremendous opposition to a sales tax. The Ways and Means Committee made a tactical mistake. I am convinced of that now. What they ought to have done was to bring in a bill imposing the taxes suggested by the Treasury Department-a tax on radios, a tax on automobiles, a tax on cigarettes, a tax on tobacco, an increase in the postal rates, a tax on checks and conveyances of real estate, and all that sort of thing. We can get the money by resorting to the irritating war taxes, which we hoped had been abandoned forever.

But what about the opposition to such taxes? There would have been a storm of opposition to them from all parts of this country, and there would have been opposition not artificially created. Then when we had to yield the sales tax would have been the substitute. And it could have been adopted easily and without much trouble. But following our honest convictions we put it in first.

Now, judging from the debate on this floor, as far as it has proceeded, I get the impression that a great many Members think this is a new and untried experiment, and therefore, we ought not to embark upon it now because we do not know anything about it.

There are only two older taxes in this world than the sales tax. The tariff tax dates back 2,500 years before the birth of Christ. The ancient Egyptians imposed their tax at the frontier. It became our tariff tax, and during the ages and during the centuries it has come down to us. No nation ever existed in this world without imposing it. It fits in with the idea which tax makers like to adopt. It is a tax that you do not feel because you do not know you are paying it and that gives it an appeal. No party in this country of any size or of any importance ever advocated free trade. The tariff is a painless tax.

I have been devoting many months of time in the passing years trying to convince people that they paid the tariff. and you can convince them they do. There is no trouble about that. But they do not care because they are not acutely conscious of it.

The next tax imposed in the order of tax development in the world was the estate tax. In the old days they called it death dues. Ancient Egypt imposed it a thousand years before the birth of Christ. We have just got to it now, just a few years ago. Babylon imposed it; Rome imposed it, and finally we came to it when we were compelled to do so. That is a favorite method of taxing from the standpoint of the tax maker, because it is paid by a man who can not object. He is dead. That is the reason. His heirs are glad to get what is left of his estate just as quickly as they can

Then next in order of tax development we come to the sales tax. Some of you gentlemen think it is new. The Greek cities imposed it 500 years before the birth of Christ, and under those circumstances that does not impress me as a new tax. It did not soon disappear from Greece. They clung to it until the city states of Greece collapsed and chaos came. Then they did not have much taxes of any kind in the civilization they had after the collapse of their city states. Rome commenced to impose it in the year 9 A.D. The Emperor Constantine imposed it, and it became soon a part of the Byzantian tax system, and continued on down through the ages. Spain imposed it to a greater extent than other nations 1,000 years ago. Her cities imposed it, and then they divided it with the king. He maintained his armies out of the 50 per cent contribution of the overlords of the cities of Spain. They furnished it all and it was derived from a sales tax.

Then for a long time it was discontinued until the World Germany imposed it during the war, France imposed it just at the close of the war, and now every nation in this world of any importance imposes it except Great Britain and the United States. Under these circumstances it appears to me that those newspapers which are trying to impress upon the country the idea that it is an untried and a new experiment must surely be wrong about it. An experiment that has lasted through all the centuries of recorded history, I contend, is not new.

In drafting this sales tax we had the best of help. The tax auditor of Canada came here. He was just on his way back from Australia. Canada had loaned him to Australia for the purpose of assisting them in rewriting and perfecting their sales-tax system. We had his suggestions and his assistance.

In drafting this bill we studied the present sales-tax systems of all the nations and of the States of the United States which have imposed it. We have in West Virginia a thoroughly well-developed system of sales taxes and they have had it for several years.

We condemn a sales tax. Is there any State in this Union that does not impose it on gasoline, some of them on cigarettes, and the States imposed the objectionable kind of taxes? They can not impose any other. They impose the objectionable kind of taxes which violate the fundamental principles of taxation; the purchaser knows he pays it.

I have been a member of the Ways and Means Committee since and even during the Payne-Aldrich bill. No man on that committee at present dates back as far as I do as a member of the committee. For 20 years of time and more than that I have been studying carefully the subject of taxes. I think I know something about the art and the science of drafting and imposing taxes, in factand I do not want to seem to be egotistical-I know all about it. I am going to tell you the result of my studies, covering nearly a quarter of a century of time, so that you gentlemen who have not studied it as much as I have will know just as much about it as I do.

I have helped to draft more tariff and more tax bills than any other man living in the United States to-day, so I ought to know something about levying taxes.

Now, I am going to tell you what the science of levying taxes is. I can tell you in a few words so that you will understand just as much about it as I do, who have studied it for nearly a quarter of a century. From the standpoint of the responsible legislator, who is going to be criticized for it, the science of levying and collecting taxes is the science of getting the most feathers with the least squawking of the goose. That is all there is to it. [Laughter.]

There is nothing so full of intense human interest and romance as the study of taxes during all the centuries.

It simply shows that 3,500 years before the birth of Christ, and in all the centuries which have followed, men felt about taxes just as we do now. They adopted the same methods we prefer to adopt at the present day. They were moved by the same emotions that move us to-day. They had just as much trouble with their constituents as we are having. Therefore, they were driven, all of them, to the least objectionable kind of taxes.

In Canada they impose 4 cents, almost twice as much as we are going to ask you to vote for in this bill, and our information is that they do not know they pay it; that retailers advised Members of Congress who went over there recently and made a careful study-and I am sorry now I did not go with them-that they did not even know they paid the taxes on the goods that came to them.

So we are proposing this tax which nobody will feel after it once gets in operation. It is spread out all over the entire field of industry, exempting business which has a turnover of less than $20,000 a year, and this is the highest exemption granted in any country in this world at the present time, carrying these foodstuffs as exempt, exempting farmers from their seed and fertilizers. Our exemptions are much smaller, of course, than the exemptions in Canada. They cover 10 pages. They are longer than the bill. They are much smaller than the exemptions in Australia. In Australia the tax is three times as high as this.

We have avoided all their mistakes. We had that advantage in preparing this bill. We have preserved in the bill all the good features of other sales-tax laws in other countries, and it operates in an exceedingly simple way. We have avoided multiple, turnover pyramiding. We think this sales tax bill is the best drawn sales tax bill in all the world.

We have made it terminate automatically on the 30th day of June, 1934, so that it is in operation only a little over one year. We hope by that time business will have revived. We know that it will not revive unless we balance this Budget and restore the solvency of this Government, and we hope by that time this tax will not be necessary. So we have provided for its automatic termination.

Now, I am wondering what causes all this opposition to it. I charge it up to the new kind of lobbying we have here in the Capital City.

When I first came to Washington, and until just a few years ago, I was glad to see a lobbyist come into my office. They were all men who understood their subjects, and they presented me with data and with facts and with figures that saved me hours of time in making up my mind as to how I wanted to vote on that particular subject. But that class of intelligent, helpful lobbyists has disappeared from the picture, and now invisible lobbyists take their place. You never see them, they do not call at your office, but I have discovered who many of them are.

During the progress of this bill, when I commenced to hear from my State and from all over the country in opposition to the bill, I put all my stenographers to work answering every letter, and I answered them in this way:

"I have received your letter and I am very much interested and I am giving to your suggestions a sympathetic consideration. You are so far away that I can not talk to you, but you were probably requested to write to me by somebody who has studied this subject and who knows, and I want you to tell me who he is."

Most of them were not interested enough in their letters to answer, but many of them did, and when they answered I commenced to find out who these lobbyists are. They gave me their names. They are highly paid gentlemen, they live here in Washington, their headquarters are here, although some of them are in New York, and their business is to collect from organizations a large compensation for themselves, and when they want to influence a tax or tariff rate or anything else in favor of their particular organization, they get the names of many people from the directories back in the States and they write to them and say:

"This tax is about to be imposed upon you. You are going to have to pay it. You are being taxed enough now. It is going to ruin this particular industry. Write to your Member of Congress and ask him to vote against it."

Then they commenced to write and you commenced to hear from them. I wonder that the post-office deficit does not disappear, judging the situation from the number of communications you have been receiving.

Now, this particular kind of lobbying was started here in Washington just five or six years ago, in 1926, by a man by the name of Arnold—J. A. Arnold. He is here yet, but he is discredited now and has lost much of his influence.

He organized the American Bankers' League; that was unpopular and he gave that up. He then organized the American Taxpayers' League. The reason for these organizations, especially the latter, because it had a more appealing name than the other, was to defeat the estate tax.

Soon Members of Congress began to receive pressing letters from their districts. "You are digging into the grave for taxes. Can not you run the Government without doing that? We are writing to tell you that we are opposed to the estate tax."

Then they organized a trainload of members of the legislatures of the various States. They paid their expenses on a junket trip to Washington, and they put up at the best hotels here; they brought them down in parlor cars and automobiles through the streets and packed and jammed the corridors of the House Office Building and the rooms of the Ways and Means Committee. They did not know anything about the subject, except that they were told by Arnold to go and fight against that particular thing.

I remember that as the hearings proceeded—I knew Arnold was in the room; he sat over in the corner, and I said, "Is Mr. Arnold in the room?" No answer. I said, "If Mr. Arnold is here I would like to have him answer, because I want to ask him some questions." No answer. Finally, we got him on the witness stand and he testified. He did not know anything about the estate tax, but there were a lot of people who did not want to pay it.

Out in Chicago, Ill., there were a lot of them. During seven months Arnold collected $61,000, paid himself out of it at a salary of $1,000 a month; and if he did not keep the rest of it nobody could find out where it went, and he conducted this propaganda.

In Illinois there were 38 contributors to this fund, as the hearings afterwards disclosed. Their names are all printed in the hearings before the Senate committee. We could not get it; he would not even tell me where he kept his deposits, in what State. Contributions ran from $500 to a thousand dollars, and of these 38 contributors from Illinois 30 were corporations that could not die so as to leave any estates. I have the names of all of them, officers of these corporations who misused these funds. They paid their contributions out of the assets of the corporations, ultimately to save their own estates. These gentlemen are embezzlers, every one of them. They ought to be in the penitentiary.

Ten of them were railroads in Illinois. How can a railroad leave an estate?

We so thoroughly advertised Arnold throughout the country that he did not get anywhere with his threats. The estate tax remained a law. Members of Congress who were timidly hearing from him now hear from home in another direction. Nobody wants it taken out of the law; it is in there forever.

We are doubling the estate tax in this bill, and nobody is objecting. But Mr. Arnold's activities are over.

Now, a new kind of lobbyist has developed. They have abandoned the objectionable features of Mr. Arnold's methods. I know who these men are. I may mention their names as we proceed under the 5-minute rule and begin to hear of it on the floor. I thought of doing it now, but I am going to postpone it.

This is the weakest and most contemptible kind of lobbying. When you hear from men who have been induced to write you these letters you hear from men who have not studied it, but they are told, and they believe, that they are going to be injured by this tax, so they wait, these suave gentlemen, who receive salaries of $1,000 a month and more than that and sit back in their offices and smile as they pull the string and make you gentlemen jump, and you do not know who is pulling the string. You know somebody is. You are not really hearing from home, you are hearing from the lobbyists of this new kind, who have not enough information or ability to come to your office and discuss this matter in an intelligent way with you.

The Illinois Manufacturing Association has sent out to every manufacturer in Illinois a circular headed "Manufacturers' Sales Tax a Dangerous Menace." Let me read a part of it:

Once established, a manufacturers' sales or turnover tax will never be relinquished as a major source of revenue by the Federal Government.

Here is another clause:

If the Members of Congress and the administration leaders will disregard politics and make a real determined effort to deflate the cost of government they can save a much larger amount than they expect to raise from the manufacturers' sales tax. Please wire your objections to the Illinois Members of Congress, a list of whom is subjoined. Prompt, aggressive action is essential.

The executive vice president signs it, and then follows a directory of the Illinois Members of Congress and where they live in Illinois, so that they could send them two letters if they wanted to, one at home in Illinois and one here in Washington. Mr. Chairman, I denounce those statements that I have read from this distributed circular as deliberately and knowingly false on the part of the officers of this organization who sent it out. The man who sent it out is James L. Donnelly, executive vice president, and it is being sent out apparently with the approval of the officers of the association. Hon. Edward N. Hurley is one of the officers of that association. I wrote to him telling him what the charge was in this circular, what the statements were, and asked him whether he approved of it. You gentlemen all know Edward N. Hurley. He occupied an important place in Washington during the awful period of the World War. He is an economist. I found upon looking up the records over here in the Library of Congress that he has written 11 books on economic subjects. He knows what he is talking about. Many of you gentlemen have listened to Edward . N. Hurley. He is an officer of this organization, and here is his telegram to me:

Your message to Chicago received. I am in full accord with the nonpartisan efforts of the Ways and Means Committee to pass a sales-tax bill along the lines unanimously reported out by that committee and supported by Secretary of the Treasury Mills and Speaker of the House Garner. The business interests of the country must recognize that the costs of government must be met, and the more equally taxes are distributed, the less the burden will fall on any given industry.

EDWARD N. HURLEY.

That is what an economist has to say. That gentleman is one of the leading Democrats of this country, and that is what he has to say about it. He pays income in the higher brackets; he is one of the rich men of this country. We are going to take practically half of the incomes of the rich, who pay in the high brackets. We get him there, and he knows it, and in addition to that he is one of the great manufacturers of the United States, and we get him there, and he knows it. He ought to have a personal interest in the subject matter of this bill, and he has; but he is a patriot, an economist, and a Democrat, and he rises above personal interest. If we had more manufacturers in this country who were capable of doing that, we would get this bill through just as it is written and without trouble.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman refers to the Tax-payers' League, which I have always criticized.

Mr. RAINEY. I know the gentleman has, and very effectively.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is it not true that the Taxpayers' League and their contributors, particularly the bankers and other large contributors, as shown in the Senate hearings, have been advocating a sales tax all of these years?

Mr. RAINEY. I did not know it. If they have I congratulate them, and I am glad they have done something that was right, but they have not been doing it with much vigor since they have had a chance to get it. I did not know the organization was in existence now.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Oh, they started again after we quashed them; but they have been very keen on a sales tax.
Mr. RAINEY. They have not been very keen since there is a chance for them to get it. I have not heard from them.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. Mr. BRITTEN. The

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman just mentioned Mr. Edward N. Hurley, of Chicago. Although Mr. Hurley is a great outstanding Democrat, he was appointed by an outstanding Republican President, Calvin Coolidge, a member of the European War Debt Funding Commission, because of the character of the man himself. Mr. Edward N. Hurley is an outstanding character in the United States, irrespective of politics.

Mr. RAINEY. I am very glad to have that contribution about Mr. Hurley from the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman knows Mr. Hurley as I do, and means everything that he says.

Now, I am wondering if the country appreciates what the deficit really is that we are trying to meet at the present time. The real deficit, including the financing of loans to veterans of $507,000,000, in 1931 was $2,123,000,000. spent that much more than we took in. I figured out the real deficit for 1932, what it will be on the 30th day of June of this year, and I have included the commitments we have already made, such as $500,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $132,000,000 for roads, the Federal land-bank appropriations, the appropriation for relief of farmers; and that totals up $2,717,000,000. In order to get what I conceive to be the deficit at the end of this yearand in order to make it easier for me, as I am not much of an accountant to figure it up-I have just added to that amount $160,000,000 for future commitments we may make during the remainder of this session. We will make more than that. There is the soldiers' bonus proposition-a possibility. There is the appropriation for a pension bill to widows and dependents and perhaps parents of deceased soldiers: there is the drainage relief bill: altogether I have mentioned enough possibilities to make much more than that, but I am only adding $160,000,000 because it is a little easier to add that. It will be more than that. I have limited it to $160,000,000, which makes our deficit for the last two fiscal years $5,000,000,000. We ran that far behind. We are not paying any attention to that in framing this bill for 1933. That is water that has gone over the dam. We are not going to include it. That will be written into the national debt, and much of it is now added to our national debt.

Do you realize what a charge that will make? Suppose we could float bonds at  $4\frac{1}{4}$  per cent for 20 years. We can not do that now. We never can hope to do better than that, but  $4\frac{1}{4}$  per cent on \$5,000,000,000 added now to the public debt, would mean an annual interest charge on the people of the United States of \$210,000,000.

If we do not balance this Budget, if we continue to borrow, as some people think we can, it will not be long until we have an added additional interest charge that may equal the entire expense of maintaining the War Department. It will not be long, if we continue our prodigal methods of borrowing money, until we have added an annual interest charge that may wreck even this Government, not even taking into consideration the fact that some day we will be compelled to pay these bonds. Yet there are men, not many of them on this floor, who advocate that we should continue borrowing and that that is the way to finance this Government.

Our bonds are now selling below par, some of them selling as low as 85, and some 4¼ per cent bonds are being maintained now at par, but do you know how that is done? That is done by this great Government of ours. We are ourselves our own biggest trader in our own bonds, and the law wisely permits it. If it were not for the fact that back of that stock market in New York, which now maintains some issues of 4¼ per cent bonds at par, there was this great Government of ours, buying and selling all the time to sustain its bonds, there would not be a bond selling above 90.

That is the situation that confronts us. The United States Government does not have any assets. A great many people think it has. It is the biggest business in this world with no assets. The only thing the Government owns is its public buildings, and they never can yield a revenue, and its public lands. What is left of the public lands is only fit for grazing. The Government can not give them away. They are trying to do it. The only asset this Government has consists in its power under the Constitution to tax its people in order to maintain itself. We who sit in this House and those who sit in the Senate have a responsibility which we must meet with courage. We assume that when we come here. We are the directors of the biggest corporation in this world, and it has 120,000,000 stockholders. At the present time this great corporation, with almost unlimited wealth, depleted in value, but artificially depleted, is bankrupt. That is the way to express it. There is no other way, unless you restore its solvency. You can do that, and it is up to you to do it. Failure to tax the stockholders means continued borrowing to run this Government, a continued depreciation of its bonds.

I hope there are none here who do not want to balance this Budget; but if there are any who do not want to balance this Budget, they are simply voting to project into the future the present insolvency of the corporation which they represent here as directors.

This debate has proceeded far enough to convince me that this Budget is going to be balanced. [Applause.] That fight has been won. It convinces me that it is going to be balanced either by resorting to the manufacturers' sales tax feature or by resorting to the objectionable war measures which nobody wanted when they were imposed, but the people of the country were then in a furor of patriotic enthusiasm. With my limited means I bought bonds, and so did you. I bought bonds at par when they were selling on the market for less than par, and so did you. I would not do it now, and neither would you. We can only restore the solvency of this Government and sell more bonds by wiping out this immense annual deficit. If we do not do that, the deficit will be projected farther and farther into the future and will only increase in intensity.

I wonder if you, with the figures I have given you, know how much this Government is running behind every day. The deficit, calculated in that way, amounts to $7,882,000. Every day we sit here debating this bill there is added to the deficit $7,882,000—an almost inconceivable situation.

Now, this Illinois Manufacturers' Association tell us to balance the Budget by cutting our own salaries, and we have got to do it. That is coming. We have got to cut other salaries as well as our own. I have been advocating cutting the salaries of every Government employee who receives $5,000 a year and more than that, 10 per cent, clear up to the President.

Senator Borah advocated the same thing. I thought it must amount to something coming from that source, so I advocated it, too. I followed that leadership.

Do you know how much of a cost saving that would make? I put the figures in the Record on the 8th day of February. That would save $3,400,000 in a year. That is all. In other words, by cutting every salary 10 per cent from $5,000 up you would meet our Budget deficit for one-half a day of time. Cut it 20 per cent and you will meet our Budget deficit for one day of time, so tremendous is this proposition.

Now, if you cut everybody's salary 10 per cent, from the President down to and including the laborer who gets a few hundred dollars a year, do you know what the result will be? We will have met this present Budget deficit for eight days' time and that is all. So cutting salaries is not the way to meet the deficit, yet a great many people think you could do it. Make it twice that cut and you can figure out how much that would be. You can not save this Government by cutting salaries. But the railroads have set the example and the railroad employees have agreed to it. They have cut their salaries and we are going to have to cut everybody's salary, in my judgment. I will vote to do it—you can make up your own minds about it—from the very highest to the lowest, not because it will accomplish much in meeting this Budget deficit; it will be negligible; but on account of the psychological effect upon the people of the United States in this period of stress and worry and terror. They must be convinced we are doing our part, even if it does not amount to much, to relieve this awful situation.

Now, may I tell you how we arrived at this deficit?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 30 additional minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. This is the way in which we arrived at this Budget deficit. When we commenced our work the first of this year we were advised by the Treasury Department that the Budget deficit was $903,000,000. That is what they told us. Bernard M. Baruch, of New York, a great economist, one of the world's richest men, and I might say, as you gentlemen know, a Democrat, came down to see us. It was on Sunday afternoon. I was at work in my office. I am reluctantly compelled to work now on Sundays. He found me in my office. I was doing essential work and, therefore, I square things with my Episcopalian conscience. He brought his expert economist, General Henderson, of New York, one of the most accomplished economists I know. They sat down and it was not 10 minutes until they convinced me that this deficit was wrong, that the real deficit was much more than that. Then I called up CHARLIE CRISP, who does not violate Sunday even if it is necessary. He was home. I told him I wanted him to come down at once on an important proposition, and he came. I disturbed his Sunday rest or his Sunday devotions, whatever it was. He came and the four of us sat down together. Charlie knows more about these things than I do. He is required to know more about it than I because he is running this committee now. It took less time to convince CHARLIE CRISP that this deficit was wrong than it took to convince me, because he thinks better and quicker than I do along these lines. We asked Mr. Baruch and his economist to remain over until the next day and appear before the committee.

Then we took the matter up with Under Secretary Mills, now Secretary of the Treasury, and presented to him what Mr. Baruch and General Henderson had told us. He said that the deficit he had already told us about was based upon last October's figures and that business had grown worse since October and, therefore, he said, they may be right about it. He said, "Send them up to see our experts; let them talk it over and we will arrive at a conclusion as to what this deficit is." They went up there and the result was that they fixed the deficit at $1,249,000,000, an increase of $321,000,000. Now, that increase of $321,000,000 had occurred in two months' time, because the downward curve of business had continued. So we estimated the deficit at that figure. Mr. Secretary Mills said to us that figure was based upon the theory that the downward curve of business had reached its lowest point and from that point on the trend would be upward. That statement looked encouraging, but let us see what the facts have been.

I will now read from a confidential—no longer confidential because he agreed to this—statement made by Mr. John Moody, of Mocdy's Investment Survey, one of the most reliable investment studies we have, and Mr. Moody is an economist second to none. This is what he says with reference to the January situation. I will read now from Moody's Investment Survey:

January's statistics, now fully available, indicate that industrial activity instead of recovering fell back again to a new low level. February figures, as far as they can be obtained, show little, if any, improvement. There are no signs that trade is feeling even a normal seasonal activity. From evidence thus far available there is reason to doubt the appearance of a spring rise of normal proportions.

In mentioning the trade indicators, as he always does in reaching his conclusions, he says:

So far, these indicators have failed to show any sign of reversal of trend. On the contrary, steel activity, electric-power production, car loadings, building contracts and the like, all have refused to follow even normal seasonal improvement, and preliminary statistics for February seem to indicate that this month, allowing for the seasonal factor, may be lower even than January, which in turn showed a decline of about 3 per cent from December.

And December, I might add, showed a decline of 3 per cent from November, and November showed a decline of 3 per cent from October, and this estimate is based upon the theory that the decline ended on the 1st day of January, and the trend was then upward. If two months of business decline can result in an increased estimate of our deficit of $325,000,000, then the two following months of this year, adopting the same method of reasoning, may show the same increase in this deficiency. If this is true, this will add some more to the deficiency.

Now, let me tell you something else. In estimating our receipts for 1933, we estimate that the nations which will owe us $270,000,000 in 1933 are going to pay us $270,000,000 in 1933. I do not believe they will pay us a dollar of that amount; and if they do not, that still further increases the deficit by that amount.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague vield?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Judging from the remarks of my colleague the gentleman from Illinois I am constrained to believe that the gentleman has no confidence that the bill now before the House will balance the Budget, as the gentleman has stated must be done. I would like to know if that is what the gentleman expects us to understand from his statement of his position.

Mr. RAINEY. I hope that the new confidence inspired by the courage of this House in balancing this Budget may cause a trend upward of business in the United States. [Applause.] I hope it will do it. I fear it will not; but because I fear it will not, I am not going to make matters worse by trying to balance this Budget with a false paper balance. I am going to vote for these measures I know will yield as much as we say they will; and if the deficit is going to be greater than that, for God's sake, we can not afford to make the condition worse by not balancing the Budget now, and, according to these figures, whether it will do it or not, we can not borrow any more. We may be compelled to make some more short loans next year in order to meet these things; but if you do not balance this Budget, gentlemen, or if you try to do it by a paper balance that will not yield money, I want to say to you now-and we have got to talk plainly, we directors of this great corporation who are assembled here now on the most serious business that ever affected the corporation of which we are directors—if we do not balance the Budget or come as near doing it as we canif the future develops a deficit, that is not our fault—we are going to have here in the United States in the immediate future, and it may occur this summer, the biggest panic any nation ever had in all the history of this world.

Balancing budgets! They are doing it now in Europe. Russia, with her communistic government of which we do not approve, balances her budget, and her budget, gentlemen, is $12,000,000,000 a year, and she has got it balanced. I was there this summer and I know what I am talking about.

Fascist Italy—they have there a kind of government of which we do not approve—Fascist Italy is now balancing her budget under a dictatorship, the very reverse of communism, and we are just as much opposed to a dictatorship as we are to communism. We occupy a different field from either of those countries.

Shall we timidly decline to do these things and admit that this country, the richest country of all the world, can not do what they are doing in a communistic government or what they are doing in a Fascist government?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Agreeing with the gentleman that the Budget should be balanced—

Mr. RAINEY. I know the gentleman agrees to that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman's view so rigid as to believe it can not be balanced unless we adopt a sales

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, no; I did not say that. We can balance it by resorting to such objectionable taxes as my friend suggests-objectionable from my standpoint, not from his. The gentleman is just as conscientious as I am and I recognize the great service he is rendering here in this

Mr. CRISP. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. Mr. CRISP. Is not a tax on gasoline, tobacco, automobiles, or any other matters of excise tax or tariff just as much a sales tax as the manufacturers' tax in this bill?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, yes; of course it is a sales tax; but it is a sales tax that is most objectionable because the consumer knows he pays it.

Increased postage! The gentleman from New York has recommended it. That is a cheerful sort of situation for a candidate for Congress to face. He would have difficulties, or I know I would, getting over the hurdles this fall if that kind of campaign document were circulated against me in my district, so that every time any one of my constituents put his postage on a 2-cent letter there would be staring him in the face the additional 1 cent. I would not want that kind of campaign document circulated against me. It may be all right in the gentleman's district, but it would not do in mine.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is not that an earnest of good faith of willingness to balance the Budget?

Mr. RAINEY. It is unparalleled courage on the part of the gentleman from New York [laughter and applause]-a courage that I do not have—but I will do it if we have got to do it, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to know what would be the result, in the gentleman's opinion, in raising revenue if we should put everybody to work?

Mr. RAINEY. Well, my friend has given so much study to that question, I am going to let him answer it himself some time on this floor. [Laughter.] If he could get everybody to work under an insolvent Government which would balance the Budget, it would be a miracle that has not been equaled since Christ turned water into wine. [Laughter.] I hope it can be done.

Mr. KELLER. It can be. Mr. RAINEY. I admit it, if you can put everybody to work it will do it; but how are you going to restore the buying power?

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. I am very much interested in the gentleman's wonderful speech; but I want to ask him if he has changed his sentiments on the sales tax on account of the existing situation or on account of further study?

Mr. RAINEY. I was induced by existing conditions to make that change.

Mr. THATCHER. And the gentleman thinks that is the best method to reach the trouble?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. Increases in postage may appeal to some with more courage than I have. Taxes on cigarettes may appeal to you, but the ladies will know about that, because they like to economize and bargain. [Laughter.] You might place a tax on gasoline to be paid at the filling stations. I have not the courage to do that, as a first resort. Gentlemen who advocate it have more courage than I have.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I wonder why gentlemen who have the supreme courage to propose an increase on postal rates do not advocate increasing the rates on newspapers so as to make them pay the cost of the service.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I am sorry the gentleman injected that into the bowels of my speech. [Laughter.] The question answers itself. I have trouble enough with the newslater. He can answer it so much better than I can under the 5-minute rule, but I do not think it will do any good.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. It was stated by some member of the committee that increasing the estate tax would probably produce sufficient revenue to balance the Budget.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; you could take all of the estate, but we would not get any money when we need it. It would take the estates of men that are not yet dead. After they died it will take from a year to two years to administer their estates. Taxes will not be paid until the administration is ended of every man who dies from now on after June 30, 1934, and we need the money during 1933. This estate tax is going to prove a disappointment.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman does believe that what we are going to do is for the convenience of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. RAINEY. Nobody does anything for the convenience of the Federal Treasury. Most everybody has the impression that in some mysterious way money floats down from heaven and fills up the Treasury, and they think they send their Representatives to Congress for the purpose of getting it out [laughter], and not for the purpose of getting any more in. If you start to put any more in, you hear from the newspapers and the propaganda letters.

Nobody likes to pay taxes. Nobody ever did in the history of any nation in this world. I do not like it. I pay taxes because I am compelled by law to do it. I do not pay any more than the law compels me to pay, and I am not going to do it. Nobody else does. They are not voluntary contributions. They have got to be paid in order to carry on the Government.

May I tell you one place, however, in the United States where they do not propose to pay taxes. Out in the State of Illinois is the city of Chicago. They tried to run the city without compelling anybody to pay taxes. In 1927 their tax assessment was set aside by the court because it was fraudulent. The evidence showed that if you were assessed to pay $1,000 in taxes on your real estate and you did not like it, all you had to do was to go to the courthouse and give some official $10 and he would reduce the sum you had to pay to $100. The court set that fraudulent assessment aside, and for two years they did not collect any taxes in the city of Chicago. It got to be tremendously popular not to pay taxes. The men who were in official positions naturally wanted to be reelected, because they pay big salaries out there. They did not want to incur the enmity of anybody and they all had constituents who complained about taxes, who did not want to be assessed at all. So they did not assess them. They had a perfectly simple way of financing that great city. Under the laws of Illinois a city can issue warrants in anticipation of tax collections to the amount of 75 per cent of the anticipated levy, and so with bands playing and flags flying and with tremendous enthusiasm which insured the reelection of all those gentlemen, they just borrowed the money and issued anticipation warrants. All they had to do was to spend a couple of dollars in printing some warrants and have them signed and borrow the money from the banks, $155,000,000 or so at a time. It did not cost anybody anything except that the city was out $2 for printing. What a splendid discovery that was, and how well it worked! How well it relieved them from the payment of taxes! They are going to try to levy some taxes now. They owe the State of Illinois on their tax contributions to the State $75,000,000, and we can not make them pay it, and they probably never will pay it.

On account of that fact we are discharging county officials all over Illinois because of the new system they found in Chicago of conducting a great city without paying taxes. At the present time the city owes the school-teachers of Chicago $24,000,000. The legislature has met three times at least in special sessions to help out Chicago, and all the legislature has done is to increase the borrowing power of that community. Enthusiastically, now they are trying to papers now. [Laughter.] The gentleman can answer that | float $300,000,000 worth of bonds. That will cost them a little bit more. It will cost at least $10 to print those bonds. But how much better that is than paying $300,000,000 in taxes! How easy that makes it for everybody who lives in that great city. Why, even Al Capone did not pay any taxes, and he was the leading manufacturer of Chicago for a long time. [Laughter.] I do not see his name here among the directors of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, and I do not know why they did not get him.

A MEMBER. Perhaps because he is in jail.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; he is in jail; but not on account of violating any law, not on account of any murders that his gangs may have committed, nor on account of anything the authorities of the city of Chicago have done, because they did not want to do anything to him, but he is in jail because he did not pay his Federal taxes—taxes due on account of his bootlegging industry.

The Manufacturers' Association is responsible for more charges made on the Treasury of the United States than any other organization in the United States. They are responsible for the fact that we are building there in Chicago a public building which forms the nucleus of our publicbuildings program, that will cost $17,000,000, that will cost more than any other public building ever erected on the face of this earth, except, perhaps, this Commerce Department building down here on the Mall, which cost two or three hundred dollars more or two or three hundred dollars less, I do not know which. They are responsible for the millions spent upon the Illinois waterways and the Mississippi River. They are responsible for the fact-and you gentlemen who live in Boston may know it—that we bought the Cape Cod Canal. I voted for these expenditures. Every member of the Illinois delegation voted for them. They come here once a year and line us up and tell us what they want us to do. They have advocated always the very highest tariffs, until we have now a tariff of over 36 per cent-but I am not going to make a tariff speech, gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. I have a distinct idea as to what caused our troubles, but I am not going to say anything about it now. When the house is burning down the thing to do is to put out the fire before you try to find out or even consider what caused the fire.

I shall omit a lot of my speech. I am ashamed of myself for taking so much time from other Members. I ought not to do it. I am now going to talk to Democrats, and you gentlemen on the Republican side need not listen, because this is just a private conference we are going to have on the Democratic side of the House, in executive session. First I shall read from a little statement appearing in the Washington Post of March 13:

Republican majority assured. Representative Bertrand H. Snell, Republican of New York, suave and forthright leader of the minority in the House, put the responsibility for the adoption of the tax squarely up to the Democratic leaders. Passage depended on the Democratic votes, he said, adding that a Republican majority would be behind the tax.

If he is right about it, can we, who are supposed to control the House of Representatives, go into the approaching campaign and defend ourselves if we make a worse showing than they do on the Republican side? Some of you gentlemen like to quote from Democratic platforms. I have been on platform committees more than once, and I drafted the plank opposing the sales tax. I was responsible for that plank. I did not believe in a sales tax then, and I am as much opposed to it now as ever, except that I am for it as an emergency measure. We put it in this bill only as an emergency measure. But let me read you from an authority who dates back further than any of your platforms. Those platforms now are erased temporarily.

In this awful emergency which confronts us those platform expressions of ours are obiter dicta. But let me call your attention to the expressions of a man who will live through the ages. More binding his remarks are upon real Democrats than all the platforms we have ever drafted in the history of our party. Let me read to you on the Democratic side-I know it would not influence the gentlemen on the Republican side-and this is of particular force now as we celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. This comes from an adviser of George Washington, from a man who wrote some of his communications which live to-day. I am going to read to you now an extract from a letter the founder of our party, Thomas Jefferson, wrote to General Washington 144 years ago. As decades pass and centuries pass the great Sage of Monticello towers higher, always higher on the horizon of the nations. Every one of you believe in him. The eloquent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shannon] delivered not long ago in this House one of the most effective tributes to Jefferson I have ever heard. There is not a syllable in all the expressions of Jefferson that I have ever read, even after all these years, that I can not understand and appreciate and agree with. This is his letter, when this great country of ours was in its swaddling clothes. It shows how a great man, inspired as Jefferson was, can look forward through a century and a half of time and visualize what may happen.

In this letter Jefferson said:

Calculation has convinced me that circumstances may arise, and probably will arise, wherein all the resources of taxation will be necessary for the safety of the state.

That expression seems almost inspired as we examine into conditions to-day. The time that Jefferson visualized when he wrote to the Father of his Country 144 years ago has arrived, gentlemen. In order to preserve the country of Washington and the country of Jefferson and all those heroes of the early period of our history the time has come when almost all the resources of taxation, practically all the resources of taxation of this Nation, are needed in order to preserve the safety of the state. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Bacharach].

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, for the past seven days this bill has been under continuous discussion. I doubt that I can add very much to what has already been said in favor of the bill, nor do I have any hope that in the few minutes at my disposal I will be able to change the pronounced views of those who have spoken against the salestax feature of the bill.

Much of interest and information is to be derived from observing what the opponents of the manufacturers' excise tax in this bill have said with regard to the position of the Treasury. The gentleman from Ohio declared:

This tax bill under discussion is not a Democratic measure. It has Andrew Mellon and his chief satellite, Ogden Mills, written all over it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 16, 1932, p. 6274.)

It is a matter of record that neither Mr. Mellon nor Mr. Mills recommended the manufacturers' excise tax. Their plan for obtaining the revenue necessary to supplement the stream of income taxes so largely dried up was to have a set of special excise taxes, notably including the automobile tax and the tax on checks and drafts. That is all a matter of record in the last Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress and in testimony before the Ways and Means Committee.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] takes exactly the opposite line from the gentleman from Ohio and urges that Treasury officials oppose the manufacturers' excise tax. He quotes a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that many months would elapse before the necessary administrative machinery could be set up and a number of years before such a new form of taxation could be firmly established in the country. He also called to the attention of the House and inserted in the Record an article written by the present Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ballantine, in 1921, in opposition to the general sales tax. (Congressional Record, pp. 6274 and 6275.)

It is to be distinctly observed that that article was written in opposition to a general sales tax applying on all sales as a substitute in large measure for individual and corporation income taxes. It was addressed to the conditions of 1921.

Mr. Ballantine stated:

This very consideration that the income tax diminishes in yield in bad years, of course, emphasizes the need of the Government to have at all times sources of revenue other than income taxes. Such sources can, however, be maintained as they have been without resort to the wholly inclusive general sales tax. So far as sales taxes are needed, and they will be needed for some time, use can continue to be made of taxes levied upon the sales of selected articles not of prime necessity and levied at one stage of the process only so as to avoid any cumulative effect.

The manufacturers' excise tax, as formulated by the committee, answers the doubts expressed by the Secretary as to whether the tax could be made such that it could be effectively administered. It answers the objections mentioned in the article of Mr. Ballantine referred to the unjust effect of a pyramiding tax. It answers the objection to the use of a tax resting on sales transactions as a substitute for income taxes.

In listening to the debate, I have been impressed with the fact that even though all do not agree on all of the provisions of the bill, yet there is almost a universal agreement of opinion that the National Budget must be balanced, and that there must not be any further increase in the public debt during the fiscal period ending June 30, 1933. And I dare to express the hope that in our effort to balance the Federal Budget we will not unduly unbalance the taxpayers' budgets.

There is one thing that I wish to stress right at the beginning of my remarks in connection with the framing of the bill which is now under consideration.

The Ways and Means Committee, which is charged with the responsibility of framing all revenue legislation, is composed of 25 Members of this House, representing all sections of the country.

There are 15 Democrats and 10 Republicans on that committee at the present time; the 15 Democrats are members of the majority steering committee, and in addition to that, three of them are members of the so-called policy committee of the Democratic Party.

I think I make no misstatement of fact when I say that the members of the Ways and Means Committee are all, without respect of political affiliations, honest, loyal, and patriotic American citizens; men, all of them, who have just as much at heart the well-being of the country as a whole and of their own constituencies in particular, as any Member of this House.

We have no more desire to inflict any undue burden of taxation on the people of our districts than you who have spoken against the sales-tax provision of the bill, and at least indirectly, if not directly, unmercifully castigated the Ways and Means Committee, or at least that part of its membership who are in favor of the sales tax, for daring to report out such a bill.

I have been a Member of this House since 1915, and I give way to no Member in my desire and efforts to serve my country and my district to the best of my ability; and that, I am sure, is equally true of the other members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

In drafting this bill the committee was actuated by the sole desire to prepare a bill that would bring in sufficient revenue to balance the Budget and at the same time equally distribute the tax burden in a way that will impede the return of prosperity as little as possible.

In deciding upon the recommendation of a general sales tax on manufactures, a decision which was reached only after long and diligent consideration, we were of the opinion that this course was preferable to endeavoring to select a very limited number of specified industries to carry the burden. The sounder policy is that one that treats all industries and taxpayers alike rather than to impose discriminatory taxes.

Now, why should there be such a hue and cry about a sales tax? There is nothing new about such a system of taxation. There is not a State in the Union where there is not a sales tax of some kind in operation, written on the statute books by the legislatures of the several States. If the Representatives from those States do not know this, if the taxpayers of those States do not know this, it is solely because the operation of such a tax is no burden to the taxpayer.

Experience has proved such a system to be a satisfactory one; that is why the States have taken advantage of the sales tax. And if it is a good system for the States to follow, why is it not a good system for the Federal Government, particularly at a time when it is necessary to tap every available source in order to raise sufficient revenue to put our Government on a safe and sound financial basis?

I have no fear of such a tax, and I have no reason to believe that it will work any hardships upon the people of my district. As far back as 1921 I introduced in this House a bill advocating the adoption of a general sales tax. It is true that I did not get much support for the bill in committee; so little, in fact, that I had little hope of its acceptance at this time even in the modified form of a manufacturers' tax.

In many industries this 2¼ per cent rate will be no more than the yearly fluctuation in prices that the various competitors have to meet.

The experience in Canada, where a sales tax has been in operation for some years, has been that in a buyer's market a considerable portion of the sales tax is absorbed by the manufacturers, while in a seller's market a larger portion of the sales tax is passed on.

I believe that our experience under this bill will probably be the same as that of Canada. There will be some cases in which the tax will have to be absorbed by the manufacturer, such as upon articles that sell regularly at established prices. But on the whole, it is expected that wherever the price range will permit, the tax will be passed on.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As I happen to be responsible for the statement that the gentleman referred to which appears in yesterday's Record, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the difference between a tax levied on the manufacturer, if that tax is added to the retail price, and a tax that the retailer would pay when the goods are sold? Both are passed to the consumer.

Mr. BACHARACH. If the gentleman will wait a moment I will try to answer his question. As a matter of fact, as I stated, in Canada many of the nationally produced goods which are manufactured in this country are offered at the same price. Of course, there may be certain commodities where the manufacturers can not absorb the cost and some portion of it may be passed on. The difference between the tax we are now presenting to you, a manufacturers' sales tax, and that of a retail sales tax is that in the latter the tax is placed at every stage of manufacture or production and at every stage in passing from the wholesaler to the retailer, so that there is a pyramiding of the tax of 5, 6, 8, or 10 per cent. In Australia they have a retail sales tax, and while the rate is but 6 per cent, as a matter of fact the tax is nearer 12 per cent, because of the pyramiding of the The distinguishing feature of the tax in this bill is that it avoids pyramiding. That is accomplished by the licensing system which causes the tax to rest on the sale of the completed article ready for use.

To make this tax reasonably simple of administration it is necessary to keep the exemptions limited as much as possible. The more exemptions there are, the less revenue would be derived at the low rate fixed in this bill. But with the exemptions already provided for I am firmly of the opinion that the tax burden imposed upon any family will not be an unreasonable one, even assuming the entire sales tax is passed on to the ultimate consumer, which I do not at all admit will be the case.

The changes which we have made in the income-tax schedules, the gift tax, and the inheritance tax place the burden on the wealthy taxpayers at the highest point consistent with revenue production. Those of us who have had some experience in the framing of revenue legislation know that there is a point beyond which it is useless to try to collect revenue from these sources. There is nothing to be gained by running the rates up to 65 or 75 per cent of one's income, if we can not collect any additional revenue, and in addition to that it is quite evident to all that there are few incomes these days so excessive as to tempt us to adopt confiscatory rates. Why put them in the law if they are of no value?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that there is great danger if the income-tax rate is placed very high, and especially the surtax rate, that great wealth will take advantage of the present low market for State and municipal tax-free bonds and invest there, and that we are running the risk of losing instead of gaining by putting the tax so very high, both as to the surtax and the normal tax?

Mr. BACHARACH. The gentleman from Connecticut is entirely correct. We know that a great many people of means now have put their money into tax-exempt bonds and are not paying a cent of income tax.

Mr. TILSON. And they can do that now and get 6 per cent on their money.

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if Mr. Parker was asked by the committee to give the committee information as to the amount of money that would be secured in the event the committee placed in the bill the surtaxes that were in force during the war period.

Mr. BACHARACH. I do not know that Mr. Parker was asked about that particular matter. Mr. Parker is a very efficient man. He is a man that I consult as much as I do any of the experts at the Capitol or in the departments in reference to tax matters. I have great respect for his judgment.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Well, is it true-

Mr. BACHARACH. I am going to answer the gentleman if he will allow me. Mr. Parker, to my knowledge, did not prepare such a table or statement as the gentleman is suggesting. What he did was to submit a plan based on three different methods, and it was left entirely to the committee which to accept. A subcommittee was appointed for that purpose and their report is what the full committee finally accepted.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to get some information from the gentleman. Will the gentleman tell us what Mr. Parker said would come to the Treasury in the event you adopted a graduated tax above $100,000?

Mr. BACHARACH. I do not think any additional substantial amount would come to the Treasury.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Can the gentleman advise us why the committee stopped at $100,000 with the gradu-

In other words, a man reporting an income of $101.000 pays the same rate of tax as the man that has an income of $10,000,000?

Mr. BACHARACH. It is 40 per cent above $100,000.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But under the bill a man who has an income of $101,000 and a man that has an income of $10,000,000 pay 40 per cent plus the normal tax. Both pay the same rate.

Mr. BACHARACH. And under the present law it is 20 per cent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What does he pay under

Mr. BACHARACH. Forty per cent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not the same thing in both instances? How can the gentleman get away from the fact that the rate is 40 per cent in both cases?

Mr. BACHARACH. I wish the gentleman would use his own time to make his statement.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You stop at $100,000 in this bill.

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes. Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman admits it is 40 per cent in both instances?

Mr. BACHARACH. The rate is 20 per cent under the present law and 40 per cent under this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I ask why did the committee not graduate the tax above $100,000? You need the money.

Mr. BACHARACH. We followed the recommendation of the subcommittee which was well qualified to decide that question.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Was there a single item or a single tax proposed either by the Treasury or by the Ways and Means Committee, but what various individuals from some parts of the country opposed it?

Mr. BACHARACH. Oh, they have opposed every item of the bill and every item that has been proposed.

Mr. Chairman, there is an old saying that "We can not have our cake and eat it too." Most of us who are now Members of this House voted for the appropriations which make this tax bill necessary, and now we have no choice but to provide the necessary revenue to meet them.

The manufacturers' excise tax as formulated by the committee is in truth neither a Democratic nor a Republican measure. It is the honest and inescapable conclusion of the Ways and Means Committee as a whole as to the only means of accomplishing the balancing of the Budget, and it is so framed and carries such exemptions as not to rest unjustly either upon industry, upon commerce, or upon the consumer.

At this time I want to express my regret of the unfortunate circumstances which deprived our committee of the services of our distinguished Chairman and our beloved colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Collier], and I am sure that I voice the sentiments of all of the Republican Members of the committee and of the House in rejoicing with him in his recovery to health. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SINCLAIR].

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Chairman, the theory of all equitable taxation is that it is based on the principle of "ability to pay." It should be the purpose of taxing authority to put that theory into practice in levying rates upon the people, in so far as it is possible to do so. We find that from the beginning of our Government the actual necessities of the family have usually been exempt from taxation in the raising of revenue. This is right and proper. The head of a family, with a wife and dependents, is allowed certain exemptions on his income tax over the single man, and from time immemorial the urgent necessities of the poor man have been free from tax in most countries.

Therefore it comes as something of a shock to the average American citizen to find the proposal of a general manufacturers' tax, covering nearly all family needs, included in the present revenue bill. The ordinary citizen, now earning barely enough to feed and clothe his family, will be subjected to this iniquitous tax. He will have to pay upon the every-day things of life the same rate as will the millionaire. He already bears an unjust proportion of the cost of Government. I maintain that while his earnings are hardly sufficient to meet living expenses he should pay no Federal tax. Under the provisions of the proposed bill a part-time employee, who unable to carry all family costs receives aid from charity, will be penalized by this most unfair tax. It seems probable that with such a tax on the shoulders of the poor man he will have to abandon all hope of ever acquiring more than the most meager necessities of life.

The sales tax will reduce the buying and consuming power of the average citizen and will cut profits in all lines of industry. It will, in fact, defeat the purpose of those advocating it, prolong present distressing conditions and the depression indefinitely. It is stated that approximately $600,000,000 of revenue will be raised by the adoption of this so-called manufacturers' excise tax or, in plain language, sales tax. We are informed that this tax will be practically "painless" and that the people will not notice it. To this I take exception.

The fact is, according to economic experts, that a manufacturers' tax of 21/4 per cent will not be absorbed in the course of business exchange but will be pyramided to a tax of at least 5 per cent by the time it reaches the consumer. What average citizen is there who will not feel an added cost of 5 per cent on each of the many articles and commodities which he has to buy for himself and his family? The few necessities exempt from the tax make up a very small portion of expenditures in the family budget. If the 5 per cent increase to the consumer is a reasonable estimate, and it seems probable that it is, then the $600,000,000 sales tax collected by the Government really becomes the stupendous sum of $1,200,000,000 when it reaches the ultimate consumer. An average of $50 a family will be added to the cost of living. This is the burden which the committee proposes to impose upon the common people of our country in the effort to balance the Budget.

How can farmers, who in greater numbers each year are going bankrupt because they are forced to sell their products for less than cost of production, pay this sales tax? They can not do it. When the manufacturer buys from the farmer the raw products for processing, he will deduct the tax item from these products, thus forcing the farmer's price still lower. The purchasing power of the farmer will, as a result, be further curtailed. Likewise, when the tax is passed on to the laborer, he will receive no increase in wages with which to meet it. With the purchasing power of labor in the aggregate already cut $11,000,000,000 by enforced unemployment from the peak of 1929, how can it be expected to pay this additional tax? It is preposterous to suggest it. Viewed from any standpoint, the manufacturers' tax is a direct imposition upon the farmers and workers of America, already overburdened. If adopted, the net result will be to reduce their purchasing power, slow up industry, lower our standards of living, and postpone indefinitely the day of economic recovery of the Nation. Desirable as it may be to balance the Budget it will be tragic to do this at the expense of our sorely pressed farmers and workers. [Applause.]

As a substitute for the sales tax, I would point out that we have several sources of revenue still untapped. We can step-up the tax on large incomes 10 per cent over the rates proposed in the bill. Estate and gift taxes should be greatly raised, and brought more nearly to the income-tax rates. Let us follow Canada in her rates on cigarettes and tobacco, and double the revenue from that source. Other strictly luxury taxes can be made higher. Finally, should all of these items not produce sufficient revenue, we can borrow the necessary money on short-time certificates pending the return of prosperity and normal taxing capacity. There can be no permanent prosperity until the buying power is restored to the farmer's dollar, which will be reflected in all industry. With diminishing returns on his product now, prosperity will never be attained by dragging him still deeper in the valley of debt and discouragement, which will be the inevitable result of a general sales tax. I shall vote to strike this section from the bill if given the opportunity. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Lankford].

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, we have been listening this afternoon to the discussion of this measure, and I want at this time to pay a tribute of thanks and appreciation to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey], who has spoken so instructively on this bill. [Applause.] To the readers of the Congressional Record I want to refer them to his address for information about the bill.

I have great confidence in the committee. I am not on this committee, and I have not had the benefit of the committee hearings, but I have listened with great interest to the debate. I expect that I have running through my mind the same point that has been running through the minds of others here to-day. I want to give my impression of the bill, as gathered from this debate. I am going to vote for it, although there are some items in it that I do not like. I shall offer an amendment here and there when the bill is under the 5-minute rule.

The thing that bothers me the most is the question, Is it absolutely necessary to balance the Budget? Is it essential?

Because, if it is not essential, we should not impose these additional burdens on the people at this time.

I believe myself that it is essential. The committee has passed on it, and the committee is composed of able men, among the ablest in the House, men who have been here many years, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] and others—they have had complete hearings on the bill and they have given us the benefit of their opinions. All agree that it is absolutely necessary to balance the Budget.

Now, there were some things in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois that I did not agree with. I do not agree that there is any doubt about the stability of this Government. I can never agree with any suggestion on the floor of the House that this country's credit is not absolutely safe. The country is lacking, not in stability and resources, but confidence may be lost in us, the Members of this House, if we do not balance the Budget. That must be done.

Now, as to the question about the sale of bonds. One thing that I resent more than anything else that has been said on the floor of the House was said by one of the gentlemen here yesterday, a suggestion that the bankers told some member of the committee, dared to say to this Congress, that if the Budget was not balanced this Government could not get the money it needed.

The idea of these bankers, who sold billions of dollars of worthless foreign bonds to our citizens, saying to this Congress, "If you do not do thus-and-so, we are not going to lend you any more money. I resent that statement by the bankers of the United States to their Government. The only doubt that remains in my mind is doubt of the ability of this Congress to balance this Budget, but I sincerely hope it is going to be done.

I thought that the constituents of my district would be interested in this bill. I live near by—in Norfolk—only about 200 miles away. I went there to see what their impression was. Business men, bankers, newspaper editors, the average man on the street believed in it. I did not find a single man who was not in favor of the bill. They said to me that I was to judge of the necessity for it because I would hear the debate, and if I thought it was necessary they said that they thought I ought to vote for it.

Let us look at the effect of this. A member of the committee said the effect of this tax was that if one spent $1,000, with the cost of manufacturing less than the cost of final sale, the tax being absorbed by a good many of the factories themselves, it would cost $8 per $1,000, or $4 for $500 on retail purchasers. In an emergency of this kind, with this country in the condition it is, in order to balance the Budget, does any patriotic citizen object to $4 on $500 of purchases? Is not this a graduated tax? Take a suit of clothes. The man who buys a $100 suit of clothes pays four times as much as the man who buys a $25 suit of clothes, and I have estimated the tax on a $25 suit of clothes, which is sold by the manufacturer at about $12, at 25 cents. Is that any very great burden on a citizen who is willing to do his duty, as I know all of the citizens of this country are? What other course have we to pursue, assuming we are going to balance the Budget, if we do not pass a manufacturers' tax? There is the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] to institute these nuisance taxes, and I am frank to say that I have not the courage to go to my people and say that I voted to put a tax on their checks, notes, and deeds, and increased the cost of stamps to 3 cents, or for a tax by which they would remember me every time they put a stamp on a letter. I have not the courage to do that. This is a much easier tax; it is more satisfactory, it seems to me.

Another suggestion is cutting the salaries of the Government employees. That raises another question. As far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing to cut my own salary. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] said that a half day's deficit would be what it would save to cut the salaries above $5,000, and probably eight days if you cut them all down by 10 per cent, but let me tell you this: A day or two ago we had before our Naval Affairs Committee a young naval officer, a young man who is married with two or three children. He is required to keep up to a certain extent his appearance. He has to present a good appearance. He told us after cross-examination that he had not been able to get a suit of clothes for two years. That is the condition that he is in with his expenses, and he is giving the best of his thought and effort to the defense of this country. The timid little men and women who come into our offices from day to day with salaries of $1,400 to $2,100 appeal very much to us, and is this great Government going to save its face and take this tax off the business interests of the country at the expense of these Government employees? I hope not. I shall not vote for it unless you go above the five or six thousand dollar grade, and if it is necessary to convince the country that this Congress is in earnest, that will be the reason I would do that.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, a remark was made several times to-day about the condition of the country as compared with other countries. I wish the gentleman from Illinois had named the countries in Europe that he said were not suffering and were happy and prosperous. I do not know of any. I know they have had trouble in England. I know the pound was worth $4.86, and has now dropped materially. I know the franc dropped from 20 cents to something like 4 cents. The mark has gone to pieces. I do not recall the names of the other coins of the countries of Europe and South America, but I do not know of a country in Europe. Asia, or South America whose currency or bonds have not fallen. The dollar of the United States is worth a hundred cents just as it has always been, and in spite of the trouble the world is in at the present time, the dollar is still good and worth its face value. I am going to follow the committee, because I believe the committee is right in keeping that dollar there at its full value of 100 cents. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stokes].

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, this Government, and the entire Nation—cities and municipalities, as well as individuals—have contracted a habit of reckless expenditure.

A wave of speculation swept over the country which encouraged a large amount of borrowing, which was one of the many causes of the unsettlement.

If this sales tax will balance the Government's Budget and thereby set the example to every city, town, municipality, and individual in the Nation, it will do a tremendous good to all, especially the workingman.

We, as the Representatives of the people, are charged with the duty of promoting the general welfare.

The first step in promoting the welfare of the country, and especially of the workingman, is to restore trade, industry, and commerce, and this can only be done by inspiring confidence.

Due to the lack of confidence United States Government bonds fell from 100 in September, 1931, to 84 in December or 16 per cent. Now, due to restorative measures, they have gone back to 90. Bank failures have ceased, and hoarding of money is declining.

There are only two ways of paying our bills—by taxation and by borrowing. We have somewhat over $1,000,000,000 of Government notes maturing this year, which will have to be paid off in cash. These will require, therefore, the borrowing of a large amount of money. Any additional borrowing would be embarrassing and hurtful to Government credit

The entire Nation, aye, the world, are watching us, for our deficit is larger than ever before was known. This is a big undertaking, but it is necessary to produce big results.

The income tax will not produce the result or bring in nearly as much as last year; it has fallen by at least onethird.

Unquestionably, one of the many causes of the depression is heavy taxation, but this tax does not bear heavily on business or real estate or trade, and consequently by helping these things we will help the laboring man by tending to restore good times.

Those who oppose this Budget settlement assume the responsibility of making a new one.

Public opinion generally seems to be favorable to it, because it bears lightly on all, heavily on none.

As soon as we can adopt a policy of economy this tax can be repealed.

I feel sure the House will sustain the Ways and Means Committee on its recommendation in this important measure, and thus maintain its good reputation; that labor may agree with this measure; that the rich may help the poor; that by harmony and unity we can best succeed.

What is best for one is best for all. "United we stand, divided we fall."

The leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion, and fatling together, and a little child shall lead them.

[Applause.]

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I had thought that probably we would be able to get sufficient time to discuss this bill in more or less detail, because there is no doubt it is one of the most important pieces of legislation to be presented to the Congress at this session. The question of taxation is always important. At this time it is exceedingly important.

No one would contend that any government can function successfully without sufficient revenues. methods usually employed for raising revenues are by taxation and through loans. In determining whether they should be raised from loans or from taxation it is important to inquire into the use to be made of such revenues. If they are for the purpose of meeting the usual or ordinary expenditures of government, it is better to raise them by taxation; but if they are to be used in channels of business or trade of a productive nature, or if they are to be used to meet expenditures in time of war or any other great emergency, there can be little doubt but what they should be obtained from loans. Of course, there is a school of political thinkers dating as far back as the time of Adam Smith and David Ricardo who think that governments, like individuals, should pay as they go and do so by levying taxes, whether it be in peace time or in war or any other great emergency.

The general basis for such a school of economic or political thought is that a policy of this kind prevents imprudent and extravagant expenditures by those charged with the responsibility of directing affairs of the Government. The wisdom of such a policy and the political effects are readily understood when we realize that the people generally have a great aversion to heavy taxes. It is contended that when the people's representative in a State legislature or in Congress fully realizes that increased expenditures must necessarily mean increased taxes, and when he knows that if the people are fully informed they will register their protest at the next election, such a representative will be more cautious in supporting measures providing for increased expenditures.

However, as I have already intimated, there is another class of political thinkers who hold that in times of war or other great emergency any increase in revenues should be obtained by loans in preference to burdening the people with additional taxes. While I am not setting myself up as an expert economist, I am inclined to support the idea that revenues in times of war or great business depressions similar to that in which we now find our country should be obtained through loans from the people rather than imposing increased taxes.

As a rule revenues obtained by loans come from funds unproductively employed; and if such loans are to be put to productive purposes, it is easy to see that the operation enlarges productive activities and enlarges the opportunity for increased employment and, therefore, results in a greater capacity for consumption, which, in turn, affords greater opportunity for further employment.

What is the situation that now confronts us? For two years we have had a business depression unparalleled in our history. At no time in the past do the records show we had a greater number of people without employment. At the last | session of Congress and up to the present time at this session a great deal of legislation has been enacted upon the theory that such legislation would stimulate business and afford opportunities for increased employment. It is my understanding that the necessity for additional sources of revenue is for the purpose of supplying funds to meet the appropriations made for the purposes just mentioned. In other words, as I understand the situation, these additional revenues are for use by various productive activities, designed almost exclusively for the purpose of increasing employment. If I am correct in these assumptions, there seems to be little or no doubt that from an economic standpoint the proposed revenues should be obtained from loans rather than taxation.

On the other hand, I contend that it would not only increase the burdens of the taxpayers to levy an additional tax at this time, but it would have the effect of decreasing business and increasing the number of unemployed. I think my idea can be best illustrated by referring to that section in the bill under consideration that provides for a manufacturers' or sales tax.

As I understand, the committee contends that this provision will raise a revenue of $600,000,000 annually. My contention is it would be much better for the country to borrow $600,000,000 under existing circumstances than to collect it from the producers of raw material, the manufacturers, or the consumers. For there is no doubt but what each will be called upon to pay a part of the tax and, as we have already stated, the loans will come from funds that are being hoarded or are unproductively employed; that is, such funds as are not contributing in any way whatsoever towards increased business activities or relieving unemployment. But if you take $600,000,000 out of the country in the way of a sales tax, there can be no doubt but what you collect it from a fund that is productively employed. In this way you decrease the amount of money available for continuing or increasing business and, as a consequence, you not only prevent the possibility of increasing employment, but you are contributing directly toward increased unemployment and you are removing from the channels of business the thing which is absolutely necessary for increasing business or increasing employment, to wit, $600,000,000 of actual money.

I am not unmindful of the fact that there is a deficit in the Treasury, but I am convinced that you can not wipe out that deficit by continually appropriating money upon the pretext that it is for the purpose of aiding the people and at the same time enact legislation requiring them to refund it in the way of taxes. It is like giving a baby candy and then taking it away from him.

If there is such a deficit in our Treasury as to require emergency legislation, my suggestion is that we reduce governmental expenditures and then issue bonds and sell to the people sufficient to meet the balance due, add the amount to the public debt, and pay it off when times get better. We can afford to pay taxes when times are good, but it would be a tragedy to increase taxes under the present depressed conditions.

I can understand how important it is to balance the Budget, and I yield to no one a greater desire to see the Budget balanced, but in times like these I think it the better part of wisdom to balance the Budget by decreasing expenditures than by increasing taxes. There are a number of ways to balance the Budget without resorting to a sales tax. As I have already stated, expenditures should be materially reduced; then we should increase the rate on incomes. I do not have the figures to show how much revenue could be raised by increasing the income tax, but I would favor a decided increase, because nobody pays an income tax who does not have an income sufficient to support himself and family. That is, the man who pays an income tax must first have the income, whereas under the proposed sales tax you may require a person to pay a tax when his income may not be sufficient to buy food and clothing for his family. His children may be hungry and cold, and yet when he goes to buy shoes to put on their feet or clothes to cover their nakedness you require him to pay a tax on the articles he have this sort of a tax bill? The natural prosperity would buys. It is just another way of levying additional tariff duties; that is, the sales-tax provision is equivalent to a supplemental tariff act. It is wrong in principle and objectionable in operation. This is particularly true as it applies to those engaged in agriculture, where the farmer pays a tax when he sells his raw material and then again when he buys the manufactured product.

For example, you will find when the cotton or tobacco farmer goes to sell his cotton or tobacco he will be told by the manufacturer that he can not afford to pay quite as much because of the Federal tax, and then when the manufacturer has processed the raw material and goes to sell he will say that he will have to increase the price of the manufactured product in order to be able to pay the sales tax. So the cotton and tobacco farmer loses when he sells and again when he buys. Another discrimination we notice is that under the proposed provision the manufacturer will get a certain amount of protection in addition to existing tariff laws in that the sales tax is levied on all manufactured products imported in the same manner as those manufactured in the United States. However, farm crops brought from abroad are exempt from payment of the sales tax, and the American farmer therefore gets no protection by the transaction but, on the contrary, is penalized both as a producer and a consumer.

The proposed sales tax would have the further effect of depressing or delaying an increase in the price of raw materials in a number of cases. For example, the cotton manufacturer, as well as the small lumber manufacturer, in most cases have a supply of raw material for a greater portion of one year. Of course, under the circumstances they could hardly pass the first tax levied on to the consumer for the reason that they would not be in a position to increase the price of their manufactured products. However, as soon as they go into the market for raw materials there is no doubt but what they would first deduct from the price of the material the amount of the tax they have already paid, as well as the tax to be paid next year. The result would be a reduction in the price of cotton as well as timber. So in the last analysis the producer of the raw materials would be required to pay the taxes in instances of this kind; or the small manufacturer, in the illustrations given above. would be called upon to pay taxes in such proportions that their operations would have to be curtailed and the number of employees in their establishments reduced, a condition we have been trying to relieve in nearly all of the legislation enacted at this session of Congress.

I can not conceive, by any stretch of the imagination, where the advocates of the manufacturers' sales tax can say that this legislation will increase the number of people who are to be employed, because the funds are not available, and this legislation does not make them available.

I was not favorably impressed with the statement by the majority leader this afternoon when he said that this piece of legislation would have a psychological effect, in that business would enlarge and employment would increase. If this had been the first time I had heard the statement, I would have been inclined to accept it, coming from such an authoritative source; but I remember last December we were told that if we enacted the emergency bill providing for a moratorium of foreign debts it would have a "psychological" effect on the business of the country, and employment would increase. Some accepted that assurance and voted for the bill. Subsequently we had a bill providing for an appropriation of $500,000,000 and to create the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We were told then that the passage of the bill would have a "psychological" effect on business, and industry of the country would soon begin to bloom and blossom as the rose. That has been nearly 60 days ago, and yet the majority leader [Mr. RAINEY] told us this afternoon that during those 60 days business has been going from bad to worse.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. YON. Does the gentleman believe that if we return the commodity price levels upward it will be necessary to bring more revenues than we could get under this present basis.

Mr. HARE. I will answer that in this way: If the passage of the moratorium had had the "psychological" effect the proponents of that measure said it would have, or if the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill had had the "psychological" effect that the proponents said it would have, and if the other measures had had the "psychological" effect the proponents said they would have, business would have been better, income taxes would have been larger, and the deficit, instead of becoming larger and larger every day, would have become smaller as time went on, and there would have been little or no deficit at this time; but the "psychological" effect did not materialize, and I fear that the "psychological" effect of this legislation will not materialize.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] this afternoon—and he made a wonderful speech, although I am not able to subscribe to all of it—said the operation of this tax would be such that the people would not feel it. They may not feel it, but they will know it. That is one trouble now. We can not always tell why our incomes are not equal to our expenditures. We know they are not. The farmer, the laborer, and business man all say, "We are working as hard to-day as ever, we produce as much and our prices are as good as they were at one time years ago, and yet we can not make both ends meet." Yes; they will feel it, but they may not know how it comes about.

If this tax is as fruitful as the majority leader says it will be, or if it is as harmless and as painless as he predicts, then I fear it will become a permanent policy of taxation. As a matter of fact, I have a decided suspicion that if this provision of the bill is retained there will be a determined effort within the next two years to make this system of taxation a permanent policy, because I have an impression that the big manufacturers are in favor of this legislation. If they were not supporting it, there is no doubt but what they would be registering pronounced opposition. The hearings on the bill were quite lengthy and I am unable to see where the large manufacturing interests appeared and objected or protested in any particular way. I have the further impression that the reason for their failure to appear and oppose this proposed legislation is that if it becomes a law they will then attempt to make it a permanent policy, and in addition they will attempt to amend the income tax laws, the excess profits tax law, and the corporation tax law, for they know they can pass the sales tax on to the producer of the raw material or on to the consumer of their products much easier than they can pass the other taxes enumerated.

Surely the mass of the people will not indorse this provision of the bill, and it is impossible for many of us to understand why it should be brought in here under the circumstances. Not over three months ago President Hoover was insisting upon the passage of a bill that would relieve foreign countries of debts due the United States to the extant of approximately $250,000,000. He certainly led the country to believe that we were able to finance our own obligations at home and at the same time relieve the foreign countries of their obligations to us. Now, within less than 90 days later, he comes and insists, through the Secretary of the Treasury, that unless additional taxes are levied and collected from the American people the credit of the United States will be seriously impaired and bankruptcy will be staring us in the face. If these latter representations are true, I can not understand why they were not able to see the situation three months ago. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Yow]. [Applause.]

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the financial welfare of the people of this Nation as well as of their Government. It is almost staggering to think how much debt the individual, firm, or average corporation of every part of this country is in at the present time. In addition to these mentioned there are to be added the municipal, subdistrict, county, State, and National public debt, and besides expensive governmental machinery in most instances to maintain, and the cash to pay taxes for interest and create sinking funds for maturing obligations, besides funds to meet current and future expenses of government are to be derived from commodities that are selling for less than the cost of production. Now, what is going to happen? I venture it is a hard guess for Members of this House to answer.

As a boy growing up on the farm down in west Florida during the so-called hard times under the Cleveland administration, I could not even then imagine that there could exist such a distressed national financial condition as that of the present time. Even then, as we look back, those days were not comparable to the present in their severity as to the extent that millions are now out of employment. Nor were the prices of farm products in their purchasing power and the ability of the price to pay outstanding debts, both of private and public nature, as incapable as now. Neither the municipal, county, State, nor National Governments were as deeply and head over heels in debt as at the present time. In my district the price of cotton this past season was hardly sufficient to pay for picking, ginning, bagging, and ties, let alone leaving anything with which to pay debts and taxes, which have increased by leaps and bounds for local, State, county, and city governmental expenses. The cost of State government in Florida has increased per capita from $3.78 in 1917 to $12.11 in 1930.

Bonds have been issued generally in the name of progress, for good roads, consolidated schools, improvements of streets and so forth. The conditions in my district, even, are causing the taxpayer to struggle, yet I venture to say there are thousands of communities in worse condition than mine. Of course, many economists will say that the average American wants to enjoy too much-the auto, good roads and streets, the radio, the talking movie, consolidated schools, and so forth; that these are the reasons for the present condition amongst our farmers and city employers and employees. Well, this might be true at the present time, but still these things have become a part of our national life, and it add to the tragedy that in a land of plenty when farmers are suffering on account of low prices for products that there is at the same time want and misery amongst the industrial and office workers of the country. These conditions, having come about for the reason that the administration of government during the past several years has not taken cognizance of the speculative and gambling activities of those operating in the stock and commodity exchanges. The Federal Reserve Board should have clipped Wall Street's wings before the gamblers had gobbled up the savings of millions of people not able to stand the losses they sustained when the crash came, and the depression that has followed. Debts are now to be paid with dollars that will require from three to five dollars' worth of the commodities to pay what $1 would have paid when obligations were contracted.

Well, what is the remedy or what are we going to do about it? Deflation has been rampant long enough. A larger circulation is necessary; inflation will have to take place so that cotton, corn, wheat, timber, turpentine, hogs, cattle, and other raw-material products prices will advance sufficiently that the price will enable the producers to retire their obligation and enter the market for manufactured articles that every home needs.

This will have to take place or sooner or later a cancellation of private and public debts will have to be made, or there will be a general defaulting in all obligations for the reason that the dollars of 1932 will not do the work of 1913 or pre-war dollars in so far as meeting obligations incurred, on the basis of our recent so-called prosperity prior to the fall of 1929. The present-day dollar can do things, though, that the 1913 dollar could not do. It can pay for more cotton, wheat, corn, turpentine, and many more of the raw-material products than the 1913 dollar could pay for, but even yet the present-day dollar is far below the value of the 1913 dollar in its capacity to meet the present-day obligations in buying manufactured products, paying taxes, and other outstanding obligations.

In the recent issue of Business Conditions Weekly some interesting and astounding figures are given in comparing national income, its growth and fall since 1912, and also the increase in cost of government of Nation, State, and local, and the cost of government up to the present day. In 1912 the cost of government, as mentioned above, was approximately $2,000,000,000, or 6.1 per cent of the national income of approximately $33,000,000,000. In 1924 cost of government was $10,800,000,000, or 12.2 per cent of income of $85,200,000,000; and in 1931, with a decline in national income of over $31,000,000,000, the cost of government for Nation, State, and local continued to increase to the astounding total of over $12,000,000,000, or over 22 per cent of national income of $54,000,000,000. The cost of all government is too much in almost all instances. The cost must be reduced.

Now, members of this committee, the American people and its governments are facing a crisis in the financial condition. Taxes can not be collected to cover the necessary budgets to meet the enormous demands now being made to meet the obligations of government, National, State, or local; that is, under the present existing conditions of our economic life. Either the cost of government has got to be drastically cut in every way possible or inflation will have to take place. The levying of a so-called manufacturers' or general sales tax will not save the situation. The States, counties, and other local subdivisions of government will not derive a benefit from any of the above-mentioned national levies. The local taxes back home are load enough to carry without the Congress adding to the burden of the average local taxpayer as proposed in sections of this bill under consideration.

To meet the needs of the National Treasury I would like to have the House strike out the sales tax and substitute the provisions as an amendment relating to inheritances as explained by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] or the substitute suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], or at least something besides this sales tax. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chair nan, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Cross]. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSS. Mr. Chairman, zealous in the advocacy of their cause, Members in attempting to convince their colleagues often use passionate, burning words, but with no intention of questioning the sincerity and patriotism of those who differ with them and whom they know to be just as honest in their convictions as they themselves. [Applause.]

This bill represents weeks of hard and tedious labor on the part of the Ways and Means Committee, and it is now in this House to be analyzed, criticized, and tested in the welter of debate. And when the last appeal has been made, and having reached our conclusions, an unshirkable responsibility rests upon each of us to cast his vote in accord therewith, irrespective of political consequences. I can indorse most of the provisions of this bill, including the increased rates on incomes, on estates, as well as the tax on gifts, and feel that present conditions would justify even high rates; but after weighing the many able arguments, both pro and con, I am convinced that to leave in this bill the so-called manufacturers' excise tax would be a tragical mistake. Gentlemen, this so-called manufacturers' tax is an indirect consumers' tax; and, being an indirect tax, it is a deceptive, cowardly tax, cloaked in hypocrisy that the victim may not know what is happening to him. The indirection results in taking much from him that does not find its way into the Treasury, while under a direct sales tax the consumer would pay much less and the Treasury would receive the same amount as in the case of the indirect tax.

To illustrate, if a product cost the manufacturer $100 and he pays the Government 21/4 per cent, it would make the product cost $102.25; and if he sells his product to the retail merchant so as to net him 20 per cent, the retail merchant would pay him $122.70, and then if the retail merchant sells to the consumer for a profit of 50 per cent the article will cost the consumer $184.05. Now, had this $2.25 been collected from the consumer instead of from the manufacturer the article would have cost him $182.25, but by collecting it from the manufacturer the consumer is made to pay $4.05, or nearly twice as much as the Government receives. Thus by this indirection do we mulch him to deceive him. And if you collect, as you estimate you will under this bill, $600,000,000 from the manufacturers, it will result in taking from the consumers not less than a billion, but $400,000,000 of it will never reach the Treasury. If we must lay this unjust tax upon poverty, let us at least not charge it $400,000,000 to deceive it. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, this is the beginning of a move to further impoverish the masses for the benefit of a class. The unrevealed purpose is the gradual abolition of the income tax and the substitution of a constantly increasing consumers tax, and thus to release from taxation the vast unearned incomes and transfer the burden to the farmers' implements of husbandry, to the mechanics' tools, and to the backs and stomachs of the toiling millions.

The able gentleman from Georgia, the acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in explaining this bill to the House, stated that it was regrettable that 8 per cent of the people owned 90 per cent of the wealth of the country. Recently a distinguished Senator at the other end of this Capitol declared that 4 per cent of the people of this Nation owned 96 per cent of its wealth. But let us assume that the gentleman from Georgia is correct, then let those on the right side of this aisle represent the 8 per cent of the population that own 90 per cent, nine-tenths of the Nation's wealth, and these on the left side of this aisle the 92 per cent of the population that own only 10 per cent or one-tenth of the Nation's wealth. In order to protect the citizens in the possession of their property, it is necessary that we collect taxes to maintain a constabulary, a judiciary, as well as an army and a navy. That is the purpose of the $600,000,000 that is to be raised by this sales tax and by it you say to those on the left side of this aisle who own but 10 per cent of the wealth of the Nation, you must pay 92 per cent of the $600,000,000, or $552,000,000; and then you turn to these on the right side of this aisle who own 90 per cent or ninetenths of the wealth of the Nation, and you say to them, you need pay only 8 per cent, or $48,000,000 of the $600,000,000. By this consumers' tax you say to this side that represents 92 per cent of your population, the poverty-stricken, toiling masses of your population, many of whom are jobless, you say to them, though you have not sufficient clothes to keep you warm, though you have not sufficient food to stay your hunger, yet you must eat and wear less.

Gentlemen, organized wealth with all of its tremendous, insidious influence is back of this consumers' tax, and organized wealth is making a stupendous, stupid mistake. There is a nervous, dangerous unrest among the masses. True or not, there is a deep-seated feeling brooding in them that the wealth of this Nation has become concentrated in the hands of a few as the result of unjust class legislation. In these troubled times I beg you not to add to their burdens and increase their discontent. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, the great moneyed interests of this country are largely responsible for the present deplorable condition, for they have not acted wisely in expatriating in recent years more than twenty billions of American dollars, the product of the brain and muscle of American labor, and enlisting it in the ranks of foreign commerce to employ cheap foreign labor to produce products in competition with domestic factories, putting them out of business and labor out of employment.

But we are told that we should balance the Budget without delay. But why such haste? The President has recently more than once declared that we are at war-fighting a depression that is more tragical than any war that ever gripped the Nation. What nation ever attempted to balance its budget during time of war? I assert that an unbalanced budget now and then is not an unmixed evil. The legislative halls throughout the nations never cease to ring with the cry of economy, but as long as treasuries are flush it is a cry that falls on deaf ears. It takes an unbalanced budget and empty treasury to get results by forcing economy. Experience demonstrates no Congress will practice it with a surplus in the Treasury. Necessity is the mother of frugality. But if, as some of you say, the Budget must be balanced, then let us say to this 8 per cent, "Since your vast wealth has been made possible by the labor and consumption of these teeming millions, and since you own the billions of nontaxable securities of the States, counties, and municipalities, since you own the billions of tax-exempt incometax-escaping Government bonds, the value of which you claim are to be enhanced by the balancing of the Budget, then "—let us say to them—" in justice and good morals, this tax must be borne by you." [Applause.]

Are we Democrats to be stampeded into running amuck and committing political suicide by an avalanche of wild gestures and screaming hysterical speeches? I would admonish those who make them to calm themselves, wipe the froth from their lips, and let reason get back on its throne. We are advised that this consumers' tax would produce $1,190,000,000 by 1934 and balance the Budget. Well, in three or four years we will receive that and more from our foreign debtors. They have never yet defaulted and, I dare say, will not do so. Then why this pressure to enact a sales tax? Can it be possible that it is the same financial oligarchy that has been propagandizing for the cancellation of our European debts to serve selfish motives? And once this sales tax becomes a law, would they not immediately begin to press this Congress or the next for such cancellation and cite this sales tax as the means by which we can keep our Budget balanced without the necessity of collecting those Gentlemen, the great mass of the population of this Nation in their distress and poverty have about reached the breaking point. The desire to accumulate property and better his condition has been responsible for every mental and physical effort that has changed man from a naked savage with a mentality scarcely above that of the wild beast that dwelt in the same forest with him to what he is to-day. Destroy that opportunity and you start him back to his primitive condition in that ancient forest; and when he breaks camp to start on that return, chaos will reign. It might be well for the 8 per cent to look out of their palatial windows and take warning. When Rome fell, civilization staggered into darkness. God grant that America may stand and civilization survive. But should you lay this additional burden upon our already hard-pressed, discontented millions, it will stagger them in the direction of that frightful abyss at the bottom of which lies anarchy.

But it seems those of us who do not vote for this consumers' tax are to be branded demagogues. Demagogue! What a word with which to intimidate, and how adroitly, though vainly, have we heard it thundered here. You can not intimidate a statesman by insinuating on this floor that to vote for this or that would make him a demagogue. The demagogue is he who at home speaks with "that glib and oily art and purposes not" for the sake of votes, but who here becomes a fawning sycophant and by his vote stultifies himself for a little brief adulation.

Yes; enact this consumers' tax section into law and you will increase bitterness and hate and troubled discontent. Enact it into law and still further trample upon the rights of the States. Yes; enact it into law and further reduce your State to the status of a Province. Vote for it and for the short time you have to remain here bask in the smiles and rejoice in the approbation of its beneficiaries and then return home to your people to become a private citizen and repent of your folly. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may care to use to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson].

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, there has been no question presented to this Congress which more vitally affects the present and future welfare of the American people than the tax measure now under consideration, for it not only imposes an immediate and heavy additional burden upon the masses of our citizens, but it proposes a radical and revolutionary reversal of our national policy in the method of raising the revenue to pay the expenses of the Government. It abandons the Jeffersonian theory that the tax burdens should be the heaviest upon those most able, and the lightest upon those least able to bear such burdens. By an obnoxious, outrageous, and iniquitous nuisance and sales tax, this bill places the tax burden upon the poor man and the consuming public.

The Hoover-Mellon-Mills administration by its mad orgy of the spending of the people's money has caused an enormous governmental deficit. It recommends that the money necessary to continue this extravagant administration of the Government be raised by a sales tax upon the masses of the consuming public, and I deeply regret that some of the leaders on my side of the aisle endorse this monstrous proposal. It would have been a blessing to the American people if Mellon had left for England the day he received his appointment to the Court of St. James, but I am persuaded he agreed to remain here until this oppressive tax law was passed by Congress. Mr. Mills says this law must pass. I ask by what authority does he address this legislative body in such imperative language? I say the people alone have the right to command Congress.

While I believe in leadership, yet I say as long as I am a Member of this body I intend to represent the people who commissioned me, regardless of leadership here. When that leadership is steering a course that I believe is inimical to the great masses of the American people, I shall refuse to follow under the whip of the President and his Mellon-Mills Treasury. Congress voted a moratorium on foreign debts in the sum of one-fourth billion of dollars and created a $2,-000,000,000 corporation to aid the big financial interests. I voted against both these measures because I knew they would impose an unbearable burden upon the people. We are now asked to vote for a measure which will compel the American consumers, by a sales tax, to pay $600,000,000 additional annually for the necessities consumed.

I say to you, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, personally I shall not vote for this nefarious sales and nuisance tax, which will place this terrible burden upon the already oppressed American people. Such a law will stifle and retard the return of prosperity and greatly increase the prevailing distress and discontent of the people.

The welfare of the Nation should always be placed above party welfare, yet when I am asked to abandon a policy which the Democratic Party ever has proclaimed necessary for the protection of the people, I look to see whether or not, back of such proposal, stand the high priests of privilege who expect to profit by the abandonment of such Democratic policy.

I believe in the principles of the Democratic Party, as the security of the rights of the masses, from the time of its first great exponent, Thomas Jefferson, down to and including the epochal and remedial administration of our last great President, that man who gave his life on the altar of his Nation, that man whom humanity reveres to-day, that matchless statesman and Democrat, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

The Democratic Party has consistently opposed the imposition of obnoxious sales and nuisance taxes upon the people because they place an unjust burden upon the masses.

In 1924 the Democratic Party, in its platform, made the following declaration:

We oppose the so-called nuisance taxes, sales taxes, and other forms of taxation that unfairly shift to the consumers the burdens of taxation.

To my colleagues on this side of the aisle, may I say, we are now asked to desert the principles and traditions of our party. I care not what course others may pursue, but for my part, I shall remain steadfast and true to the faith. | only mean that the consumers will be compelled to pay [Applause.]

It is the seductive and siren voice of the ultrarich and of the great monopolies which is clamoring for the sales tax. They want to see the entire burden of taxation placed upon the poor people so that they may escape such burden. They now have the hopes that if a general sales tax is enacted into law it will become a permanent method of raising the revenue and that eventually the income tax law will be repealed.

William R. Hearst, owner of a large group of metropolitan papers which are strongly advocating this sales tax, in the issue of March 13, published an appeal to the editors which contained, among others, the following instructions:

Please carry on sustained crusade, morning, evening, and Sunday, against the present bolshevist system of income taxation. The system is in itself unjust, inequitable, and un-American.

I say to you, Members of Congress, if you hearken to the voice of the great monopolies and approve this sales tax, although you think you are admitting only the camel's nose, his whole ungainly form will enter, take possession, and destroy those safeguards of the people which years of experience have proved wholesome.

Are you going to be lashed into obedience by the whip of the Mellon-Mills treasury? The Treasury experts can not definitely state the amount of the burden this bill will place upon the people. They only guess. In December they estimated the amount of the deficit and in February admitted they had made a mistake of $321,000,000 in their guess. Would it not be advisable to issue bonds for a part of the amount sought to be collected from the people under this bill until it could be determined how much additional revenue was necessary and until the people and business were able to pay an increased tax burden?

An economy committee appointed by the House is now laboring to greatly reduce the expense of the Government. When it has completed its work, it may be that the enormous amount sought to be raised by this tax bill will not be needed.

The Treasury had no difficulty in raising the one-half billion dollars for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Last week it offered Government obligations in the sum of $900,000,000, and in two days it received subscriptions for nearly $3,000,000,000.

Clearly the Budget should be balanced. This should be done by a decrease in the expense of the Government, an increase in the taxes on large incomes, the gift and estate tax, and by a bond issue for the balance until the people are out of the present depression.

Under the provisions of this bill the consumers will be compelled to pay an increased tax burden of approximately $600,000,000, while the income tax is increased only $112,000,000.

If this sales tax is enacted into law, it will levy a tax upon every laborer, every farmer, and every citizen in the Nation.

The laboring man who is now walking the streets looking for just enough work to keep the wolf from the door will be compelled to pay out of his meager means a tax every time he purchases a pair of cotton socks, a pair of shoes for his little ones, or any article necessary for their support. It is estimated that this bill will cost the laboring people $150,000,000 annually.

The farmer, who has seen his home sold under the auctioneer's hammer, will pay a tribute when he purchases a hoe, other farm implements, and all of the necessities for himself and family. It is estimated that this bill will compel the farmers annually to pay $150,000,000 additional for the articles purchased by them.

The measure, with the exception of a few articles of food, is all inclusive, for it provides for a tax upon "every article" purchased, from the swaddling clothes of the babe to the shroud which incloses the lifeless remains of the man.

It is claimed that certain articles of food are exempted from the tax, but an examination shows that only a small proportion of such articles are exempted.

All meats in air-tight containers, all canned meats, tomatoes, and other canned vegetables, ice cream, lard, and all cooked meats and prepared foods are taxed. This will not more for these necessities but that the price received by the farmer for his products will be reduced. It has been estimated that this law will reduce the amount annually received by the farmers for hogs alone $10,000,000.

The law, section 602, exempts water from the tax. I am at least grateful that we shall not be compelled to pay a tax on water and air. I suppose the sponsors of this bill exempted water and air for fear that if they did not they might incur divine displeasure; but remembering Him who said, "Even as ye have done it unto one of the least of these. my brethren, ye have done it unto Me," I say that if this bill becomes a law the Nation will merit divine condemnation for oppressing the people.

In lieu of compelling the people in their present distress to pay a sales tax upon everything purchased, I say we should further increase the income tax, beginning with our incomes as Congressmen. I would rather have my income tax doubled over what this bill provides than to vote a sales tax which would make every poor man, who can now hardly pay his bills, pay a tax on everything he purchases. [Applause.1

The bill levies no greater rate of tax against a person who receives an income of a million dollars than one who receives an income of $101,000. That is not just. I think a tax rate of 65 per cent should be levied upon an income of $1,000,000 or more.

The law grants an exemption for certain income received from foreign investments. This is not fair to the American citizens. A tax of 75 per cent should be levied upon incomes received from sources or investments outside the United States.

This is the most unjust, unfair, burdensome, and un-American law that was ever attempted to be fastened upon the American people. It will sap the very lifeblood from our people at a time when they are already bled white.

I say to you, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, although I should like to vote for the increase of the tax on large incomes, gifts, and estates, yet unless the obnoxious sales and nuisance tax provisions are stricken out I shall vote against the entire bill. I will not betray the trust reposed in me as a Representative by voting for this oppression of the people. [Applause,] Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Barton].

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, the district I have the honor to represent is peculiarly an agricultural one, and I hope I may be excused if I speak from a farmer standpoint.

The bill now before us is designed to balance the Budget. "Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished." In fact, sooner or later this must be done, or the American dollar will go the way of the German mark and the world be thrown into chaos.

Seeing the absolute necessity of balancing the Budget, we turn to a consideration of ways and means. First thought is to raise taxes, and sales tax among them. On deliberate study we find that that is a shortsighted method. It increases the depression in which we are now struggling and brings a long line of objectionable features. The present law was more than sufficient in the subnormal times from 1921 to 1930 and, supplemented with other features of this law and some sources which may be brought in by amendment, ought to be ample to balance the Budget within a reasonable time. Remove the depression and our task is

A general survey shows one-fourth of our people are working on farms at 51 per cent of their pre-war income; 8,000,-000 unemployed, earning nothing; another 8,000,000 working part time, and the remaining industrial workers working for wages 21 per cent below what they received two years ago. The greatest unemployment of all is capital, and so timid that it will not venture into any new enterprise. Restore these to normal conditions and the Budget will balance.

The country is financially sick and we are the attending physicians. Doctors tell us that the best remedy for any disease is to remove the cause and that no disease can be permanently cured so long as its cause remains. To balance the Budget by new taxes is but treating the symptom, not the disease. We must reach the root of the ailment, must remove the cause. Then we may expect a permanent cure,

Our present difficulty is underconsumption. This is not because the needs and desires of our people are low but because their purchasing power is exhausted. Bins and barns are bursting and warehouses and stores are filled to overflowing, while people are in the bread line; some of them, too proud to ask charity, are in rags, undernourished and hungry.

Much of our present tax system is based on collections from the consumer. It, like the sales tax, is said to be easy of collection, a painless operation, because the real taxpayer is not aware of his contribution. This is true of the tariff, by which we contribute millions to the support of the Government and billions to the coffers of the ultrarich who finance protected enterprises. The effect of the whole system is to widen the gap between the price paid for production and the price paid by the consumer, and by this means reduce both consumption and production.

I have been told of a system of medicine which teaches treatment of disease by giving the patient more of what he already has-if poisoned, give him more poison. I do not know whether they have ever advocated setting a dog after a man as a remedy for a dog bite, but if they did it would be on a par with this sales tax.

This leads us to investigate the origin, history, and progress of this depression, or panic, as you may call it. In my opinion it originated with agriculture, where it is still most acute, and there we should begin to rebuild. From the farm the depression spread to industry, and it is now eating at the vitals of our financial structure in metropolitan districts. To prove this statement I shall use as my principal authorities Dun's Review, known to all, and this pamphlet, The Agricultural Situation, a Government publication, issued by the Bureau of Economics in the Department of Agriculture.

On last Tuesday the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] told you how within the decade from 1920 wealth was accumulated in the hands of a few, how men with an income of a million dollars a year increased in number from 21 to 525. To this I would add that there are now in this country some 29 or 30 people with incomes of ten millions or more. Now I am going to tell you whence much of that wealth was drawn. From a revenue standpoint the chief difficulty is that the supply is exhausted.

I take it that 1920 was not far from a normal year all over the country. In that year there were 8,881 commercial failures, about an average for the two preceding years. The bank failures were 109, somewhat larger than for the three prior years. The ratio of prices received to the prices paid by farmers based on the average prices of 1909 to 1914 (figured by our Government) was 99 per cent. In other words, if a farmer took to town a dollar's worth of produce as priced in 1909 to 1914 he could get 99 cents worth of supplies priced as of the same date.

Beginning with this normal year we proceed. In 1921 commercial failures more than doubled, reaching 19,652, the largest in the history of the country up to that time, excepting 1915. This number has been exceeded every year since then excepting 1923, when it was slightly lower. In 1931 this reached the alarming figure of 28,285. The failures for both January and February this year exceed those of last year, thus indicating that the "corner" is not yet in sight.

I do not have to draw much upon my imagination to hear some one say, "Well, it was worse in 1893." Nay; not so. Then there were only 15,242 failures, or 1.28 per cent of the firms in business, while last year 1.33 per cent of the firms in business failed. Both in numbers and percentage last year made the worst showing in a half century. So much for the Nation as a whole. Now let us localize the trouble, if we can.

The ratio of prices received and paid by the farmer based on the 1909 to 1914 basis has gone down from the 99 figure in 1920 to 51 cents in January of this year. Farm taxes have sometimes improved. This time a real situation con-have gone up from 155 in 1920 to 266 in 1930. Farm mortgages have increased about two billions. Thus we find agriculture was the victime hardest hit.

Agriculture enters into the enterprise of every State, and so does industry. However, the northeast portion of our country is peculiarly industrial, while in the rest agriculture predominates. I have separated these regions for the purpose of comparison. I have considered as industrial the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, approximately one-fourth of our population. The reason banks fail is because those who patronize them fail. At this point I desire to insert a table compiled from Dun's Review showing bank failures in these industrial and agricultural regions separately, showing the complete breakdown of these financial institutions in the agricultural regions and how it is breaking across and eating at the vitals of the industrial districts.

Bank failures

The population drift is naturally from the less profitable and desirable to the more profitable and desirable occupations and locations. In 1920 our rural population constituted 48.6 per cent of the whole. In 1930 it had decreased to 43.8 per cent. A much worse showing would have been made were it not for the fact that the birth rate on the farm is much greater than the death rate. This alone, for the year 1929, accounts for 45,000 of our rural population, and in other years a similar number. (Yearbook, 1931, p. 41.)

For these reasons I conclude that there must be a leveling up or a leveling down. Agriculture must be brought up to industry or industry must be brought down to agriculture, or both must be brought to a happy meeting ground where they can enjoy equal opportunities. Paraphrasing one of President Lincoln's most famous expressions, I say, that no nation can long endure half prosperous and half depressed.

A leveling up as promised by our Republican friends in their last two or three national platforms, and wholly unaccomplished after 11 years in power, is far more desirable, especially to the farmer. This because he borrowed billions when a dollar could be obtained for a dollar's worth of produce at prewar prices. Now, he can get only 51 cents for it. He will, therefore, be compelled to pay his debts with dollars worth nearly twice as much as those he bor-

In this discussion frequent references have been made to the tariff. Protection is peculiarly a Republican doctrine. According to their philosophy raising the tariff seems to be a panacea for all ills, industrial and economic. They remind me of an old man in my country who owned a large tract of timberland. When he met adversity and became despondent he resorted to the simple expedient of raising the price of this land. Of course, he did not sell it, but it had the desired psychological effect, and he felt good over his new wealth.

So with our Republican friends. They simply raise the tariff, then wait for prosperity to return and listen for the people's praise. And, thanks to American enterprise and industry, not because of but in spite of the tariff, conditions fronts them. They are in the position of Ben Franklin, who when he had dropped a coal of fire into another man's shoe tried to persuade him that pain is only imaginary and that it would not hurt if he did not think it did. Even Mrs. Gann has discovered that there is no depression.

I was much interested on last Tuesday in the speech made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Martin] on the oil tariff. How accurately he stated the effect of a high protective tariff, and I wonder why he did not apply that logic to the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill when it was in Congress. It is the old story of whose ox is gored. Heretofore when a Democrat wanted protection for some enterprise in his district he was called a spotted protectionist. By the same token I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts is a spotted free trader.

It will be remembered that when the Republican Party came into control in 1921 it passed in short order a popgun tariff bill known as the farmers' emergency tariff act, levying duties on wheat and some five or six other farm products. This was done because that party claimed this would raise and stabilize the prices of these products. It is interesting to note that next day, or within a few days at most, the price of wheat went down on the Chicago market, and according to the Agricultural Year Book wheat sold on the markets that year 50 cents lower than the year before when it was on the free list. Wheat growers may have been deceived by such a measure, but the gamblers in the pit were not fooled. A tariff on wheat or any other article of which we produce a surplus will not function unless there is a monopoly, gentleman's understanding, or tacit agreement to regulate production or price or both.

I refer to a speech made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Amlie] last January. (Record, p. 1712.) I would like to call him my friend, but I do not know him. I am proud to be a Member of this body with a man like that. A Republican though he is, and therefore generally wrong in politics, yet he has intelligence and industry to search out and find the truth and courage to tell it to the world.

Secretary Hyde, in a release, had indicated that wheat growers were benefited by the tariff from 23 to 31 cents a bushel amounting to a quarter of a billion dollars annually. Mr. Amlie, after several weeks' study and checking, found that the only wheat affected by the tariff is about half of the crop of the hard spring wheat which is strong in protein and grown in the Dakotas, Minnesota, Montana, and Nebraska. And this instead of a quarter billion profits, only $17,600,000. This, of course, is paid, with trimmings, by the bread eaters.

After a very careful analysis Mr. Amlie observes:

The whole thing was designed and calculated to mislead and deceive, and this is precisely the effect it has had.

He further says:

I charge that the Secretary of Agriculture has shown himself to be without any sense of intellectual integrity, or, if the term is not copyrighted, guilty of "abysmal ignorance."

If Mr. Amlle is not right in his conclusions, then the only reason I can see for the Secretary to make such a release is because he thought the bread eaters would not believe him and that the wheat growers would take the bait and vote his ticket.

There is the Grain Stabilization Corporation, with its $50,000 a year chairman and other officers with comfortable salaries. I see by the papers they claim to have saved the farmers of this country $55,000,000. The basis of this figure is that the price in this country for many years has been sufficiently lower than the world market to pay cost of exporting and selling. Last year it is claimed the American price was sufficiently above that base price to aggregate a profit of fifty-five millions. If they did save, it was not to the farmer because they did not begin operating until about November, after the bulk of the wheat had left the farm and they quit before the next crop matured.

Again, at present wheat prices, they have lost more than a hundred millions. In other words, they have saved about half what they have lost, a 50-50 proposition. But that is not all—they yet have a remnant of the two hundred and odd million bushels of wheat—a white elephant—a bear on the market. I think by the time the transaction is closed instead of a 50-50 proposition it will be "ninety to nothing," with the Government on the side of nothing.

I note some days ago the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Schafer] expressed satisfaction at having voted for the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, and gave as his reason that the price of sugar had since gone down although this act raised the tariff on it. With childlike faith he seems to think that this proves beyond question that raising the tariff even on sugar does not raise the price. I suggest that he read the speech of last Tuesday made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Martin]. He seems to forget a fundamental. He should understand that the world price fluctuates and recedes. If he will read the papers he will find sugar quoted in New York with tariff paid. He can buy it in that market with tariff paid or without tariff paid, the amount of the tariff being the difference between these two prices. Unless he believes that an American tariff will lower the world market he must know that raising the tariff on an article so largely imported as sugar will raise the price in this country to the amount of the tariff above the world market. Of course, if the world price goes down more than the tariff was raised, as in this instance, then the American price will be reduced.

Again illustrating where the tariff does not function. Lard has been mentioned in this discussion. Last year, according to this book, we exported and sold abroad in open competition with all the world 568,000,000 pounds of lard. This amount is so stupendous that the human mind can hardly comprehend it. I understand the world is about 25,000 miles around. By reducing this distance to feet and dividing we find that the lard we sold abroad last year would make a smear reaching round the world weighing more than 4 pounds to the foot. In 1929 we exported 829,000,000 pounds which would reach around the world weighing 7 pounds to the foot.

Again, meats have a protective tariff—yet we exported last year more than 177,000,000 pounds of meat products. I understand that the Atlantic Ocean is about 3,000 miles across. This would make a strip of meat reaching across the Atlantic weighing 1 pound to the inch.

Now, I ask, can anyone say that a tariff would affect the price of these articles where such immense quantities are shipped out and sold on the markets of the world? What has been said about wheat and meat and lard is true in a very large sense of all staple farm products. Therefore, it is but a slight benefit, if any, the farmer gets out of the tariff under any circumstance. Yet he pays for his supplies prices standardized, localized, and monopolized behind a tariff wall, and sells in the open markets of the world and at world prices. The candle burns at both ends.

Again, I repeat that no nation can long endure half prosperous and half depressed. There must be a leveling up or a leveling down, there must be equality of opportunity between agriculture and industry.

That this country is the best market in the world has been repeated so many times on the floor of this House that I think some believe it without exception. Best for whom—the buyer or the seller? The best for the one is the worst for the other. It is the best market in the world in which to buy meat and lard and other staple farm products, and the worst in which to sell them. It is the worst market in which to buy the highly protected articles and the best in which to sell them. Again, I say, whose ox is gored.

I do not want it understood that I am an enemy to the rich. To attain wealth by fair means is an honor. However, any system which causes the wealth of a country to be gathered into the hands of a few is not a good policy. A policy should foster and encourage an equitable and reasonable distribution of wealth by furnishing equal opportunities to all its people.

In this extremity our Secretary of Agriculture advises the farmers to cease producing for export. At the present time there are some three or four million people on the farms in this country working to produce for export. If we cease this production these will be thrown out of employment or into a less remunerative employment. If so, where are they to find | and provincial governments. From our revenue system the work, or does he advise them to join the teeming millions now walking the streets and highways hunting something to do.

During this discussion much has been said about who will pay this sales tax. It seems to be the general opinion that it will be passed on to the consumer, but I tell you these are not ordinary times. The common man is already spending his entire purchasing power, present and prospective, in an effort to keep soul and body together. You may give him less for his earnings, but you can not extract money from his empty pockets. This tax would bring a long line of disasters. It would curtail consumption and with it reduce production, more laborers unemployed, more families in distress, and more children crying for food.

Then can the producers and the distributors absorb this tax? With commercial failures at the highest point in half a century, that is certainly not a promising field in which to raise $600,000,000. Caution admonishes us to tread lightly lest general financial disaster and bankruptcy follow.

There is the little theater with a 25 to 50 cent admission. It would be taxed to death by this bill. It would not produce revenue from this source and would deny the picture show to nearly all who live in rural communities where entertainments are so few.

We are now engaged in the export business. Our people in war time redeemed their obligations abroad. In the last decade they have purchased foreign securities until this House, by solemn enactment, has stamped its disfavor upon further extensions of foreign credit. Many of our industries are now establishing branch plants in foreign countries, which is pro tanto exporting the industry. Reducing farm production and abandoning farms in this country stimulates opening new farms in other parts of the world. Economically this is exporting farms. Last but not least, according to the Bureau of Immigration, many thousands of our people every year move permanently abroad, far in excess of those coming to this country. This is exporting our people. The reason is apparent. Capital can be more profitably and securely invested abroad; else why does it go? And people can obtain more satisfactory employment and living conditions. If not, why do they move? The tide of migration has reversed the traditions of a century and turned away from our shores.

I believe that this sales tax will reduce consumption, retard production, delay balancing the Budget, and be disastrous to our country in general. I am therefore against the sales tax. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the Delegate from the Philippines [Mr. Osias] such time as he may wish to use.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, in the short time at my disposal I shall not attempt to make a speech but merely to make a few factual statements.

In the course of the long debate on this exceedingly important revenue measure, H. R. 10236, we have had dinned into our ears the existence of an unprecedented deficit and the necessity of balancing the Budget. To people living beyond the confines of the United States it is well-nigh incomprehensible that the people and government of a country which they have come to look upon as the richest and most stable should be confronted with the grave problem of having to exhaust ways and means of raising revenue in the present emergency to meet the deficit of over $2,000,-000,000 and effect a balance in the national budget.

I thought it would be of interest to the Members of this body if I at this time brought to their attention the intelligence that a country far removed from the scene of our legislative labors, relatively poor, and which, according to the papers of last night, a certain executive official is depicting as unfit for economic reasons to be free and independent, is not afflicted even in the midst of these days of world stress and distress with a deficit. The government of the Philippine Islands has been self-supporting from the establishment of our present civil government in 1901. From the taxes locally levied we have maintained our municipal central government has been quite able to meet the expenses of administration of the varied activities necessary to an even and orderly progress in our domestic life. To-day it is with justifiable pride that I am able to state that our government has a balanced budget.

The authorized spokesmen of the Filipino people have appeared before the congressional committees charged with the duty of studying legislation on Philippine affairs and making recommendations to the Congress. The Committee on Insular Affairs, under the able chairmanship of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE], has held extended and exhaustive hearings, giving opportunity to all persons and organizations interested to testify. By a practically unanimous vote on the part of the members an independence bill was favorably reported out, and on March 15 the chairman submitted a comprehensive report of the committee findings, recommending that the bill H. R. 7233, as amended, should pass,

Before the Committee on Insular Affairs we presented a record of Philippine progress and of our people's preparedness. We discussed the social, political, and economic phases of the problem. We adduced evidence to prove the soundness of the Philippine currency and facts showing the condition of our government budget. It is satisfying to me as a representative of our people to read from the report of the committee the following conclusion regarding our insular budget:

At a time of universal depression, when most nations, large and small, are beset with fiscal difficulties, the government of the Philippines is in a sound financial condition. This statement is corroborated by the report of the insular auditor. From the exhibits left with the committee it appears that the Philipthe exhibits left with the committee it appears that the Philippines not only have succeeded in balancing their budget, but have in fact accumulated a surplus. Even in 1932, and in the face of curtailment of revenues, the Philippine budget will be balanced without increased taxation or abandonment of essential government services. The budgetary system was adopted in the Philippine Islands before it became operative here.

It was urged by the proponents of independence in the presentation of their views to the committee that this wise stewardship of the insular revenues evidences the ability of the Filipinos to manage one of the most difficult departments of government in one of the worst financial dislocations of recent years. (Rept.

in one of the worst financial dislocations of recent years. (Rept. No. 806, pp. 8-9.)

We have in the islands, by the way, a sales tax of 11/2 per cent and it is one of the largest sources of revenue for the insular government.

Mr. Chairman, if sound currency, adequate revenue system, and a balanced budget are among the elements that serve as a barometer of a people's ability to be self-governing and free, then it must be admitted that the Filipinos are fit and ready and that the Senate and House committees are right in recommending favorable action on legislation to remove the present uncertainty in American-Philippine relations and to grant independence to the Philippine Islands. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Crowe].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I have the greatest respect for the members of the Ways and Means Committee. I am sorry to differ with them. However, I have my own convictions. I desire to voice my opposition to certain parts of the proposed tax bill which is designed to balance the Budget.

I particularly oppose the sales tax, which is called the manufacturers' excise tax, at 21/4 per cent, which is expected to raise $595,000,000. That $595,000,000, I will show, will practically come from and be imposed upon groups of people who are already overburdened with taxes. At least, the major parts of it from these groups against that to be paid by the groups out of profits to be raised through income tax only $112,000,000 will be collected. The $595,000,000 will come in large parts from farmers, workingmen, small business men, and professional men, who in the main to-day are in the worst distressed condition they have been in for many years. The $112,000,000 mentioned will be derived from a part of the profits of those whose fortunes will not be touched by this tax. I think that it is important to balance the Budget; I believe that it should be balanced, if we can without further destroying and crippling business and without driving additional people into bankruptcy. However, I think that it is a great mistake to attempt to make the people believe that the United States Government will impair its credit if it does not balance the Budget this year.

At the close of the World War the Nation was in debt $27,000,000,000. To-day this country is in debt seventeen and one-half billion dollars. According to the latest and best figures which I can obtain, the Nation's wealth is estimated at $320,000,000,000; accordingly our indebtedness is slightly over 5 per cent of our Nation's wealth.

This talk of impairing our credit with the countries of Europe and South America does not ring true to form to me. Those countries are in debt to this Government twelve and one-half billion dollars, which, if collected, as it should be, would leave but a difference of $5,000,000,000 between what the United States owes and what it has due it from the other nations. France, England, and Italy will not cancel Germany's debt; why should we cancel the debts of France, England, and Italy?

We do not want to get in the condition that England is in; but when Members of this House talk of the credit of this country becoming impaired when its indebtedness is approximately 5 per cent of the Nation's wealth, I refer them to England, whose estimated wealth is $122,000,000,000 and their indebtedness thirty-two to thirty-five billion dollars, or 25 to 30 per cent of their wealth. To be sure, we do not want to get in any such condition; but I do not like to hear, and I think that it is absurd to put before this House and to put before the Nation, statements which would cause the people of this country to lose faith in the stability of our Government if we do not balance our Budget in 1933.

From the White House and from spokesmen of our Government we have at numerous times heard the statement that this is a calamity equal to that of war, and it is a calamity of the first magnitude. Governments are not known to balance their budgets in times of war. I am not saying this because I do not want to see the Budget balanced, but to disapprove the mistaken idea that the credit of our Government would be impaired if we do not balance our Budget in 1933. We have already paid $3,000,000,000 ahead of our schedule.

It has been reported that 8 per cent of the people own 90 per cent of the wealth of the country. This $595,000,000 tax would cause 92 per cent of the people that own only 10 per cent of the wealth to pay approximately 92 per cent of this tax. The 8 per cent of the people that own 90 per cent of the wealth would pay approximately 8 per cent of the tax. Does that seem fair and just?

I am opposed to this tax; in fact, I am opposed to any tax which will add any additional burden to our already overtaxed people. It is not fair, it is not humanitarian, and not as Lincoln said, "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." I am a believer of the founder of Democracy, Thomas Jefferson. I prefer to follow his doctrine. I stand on the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party in this. I refer to the platform of the party in 1924. It says in part, "We oppose the so-called nuisance tax, sales taxes, and all other forms of taxation that unfairly shifts to the consumer the burdens of taxation." But even though I oppose this manufacturers' tax and even though I say and believe that the credit of the Government would not be impaired in the event we do not balance the Budget in 1933, I am firmly of the belief that the Budget can and should be balanced, with part of the profits the larger groups of the country are continuing to make, and not from those who are already in dire distress. I am not opposed to capital when properly regulated; but in times of panic such as we are undergoing to-day, we can not afford to destroy the people of small means. This tax must be collected from those who have the ability to pay.

HOW TO BALANCE THE BUDGET WITHOUT THE SALES TAX

There are several methods of doing this. In the first place, according to the Congressional Record of December 16, 1930, a statement based on figures of the Treasury Department shows that during the years from 1922 to 1930, inclusive, cash refunds, credits, and abatements in connection with income, excess-profits, and inheritance taxes amounted to $3,394,508,218. This vast sum of money was handed back to the taxpayers by the Government after every reasonable reduction and abatement had already been made. It is probable much of this should have been retained by the Government.

On December 7, 1931, according to a stock letter of the National Grange under date of March 15, 1932, the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, then Secretary of the Treasury, said that there were unpaid taxes amounting to almost a billion dollars. This billion dollars, mind you, is the amount due the Government according to the income-tax returns filed, and by those filing their returns after they had deducted everything they could find to deduct. It is the amount they showed that they owed the Government by their own tax returns. Had this amount been collected as they collect from you and me, and as it seems to almost everyone that it should be collected, it would cover a large part of the deficit.

Through these vast sums, by a tightening of the collection machinery of our Government, several hundred million dollars could no doubt be collected. What farmer has been allowed to withhold the paying of his taxes? What workingman or storekeeper is given such latitude? Where can you find anyone of modest means and incomes but who has to pay taxes when due or be fined and then pay.

A second plan to avoid a sales tax I recommend is as follows:

Adopt the excess-profits tax as in operation in 1921; it is estimated that it would raise in 1933	8168 000 000
Increase corporation tax to 15 per cent, which would	4100,000,000
raise an additional tax in 1933	42,000,000
Increasing the income tax to a maximum of 50 per cent instead of 40 per cent raises an additional (This being below the war-time rates.)	56, 000, 000
Estate and gift taxes advanced to the war-time rate will give an increase of	35, 000, 000
A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on the total volume of sales in dollars of the New York Stock Exchange and the New York Curb Exchange and other exchanges of the United States estimated at	300,000,000
	200000000000000000000000000000000000000

Some time ago Mr. Hearst, of newspaper fame, wired me, along with other Congressmen, offering me a trip into Canada, with all expenses paid, to study the Canadian sales tax. For obvious reasons I did not go. One reason for not going was that I was and am opposed to a sales tax.

I am convinced that once a sales tax is saddled onto the people it will never be removed. It will also be the death of the income tax law, which is a fair law. The income tax places the burden where there are profits and where they are able to pay. A sales tax makes the burden heavier for those least able to pay. I have never been in doubt on this. I gave it careful study months ago, and when Mr. Hearst wired me the invitation to join the party I promptly refused, because I was opposed to such legislation.

It is argued by some that a sales tax is painless—that you pay it and do not notice it. In that connection I refer you to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Ketcham], who stated:

In the internal-revenue tax for the present year, Indiana pays $21,431,225. If that system of taxation were entirely wiped out and we substituted this new sales-tax policy under which we are starting to operate if this title is retained in the bill—I would like to have every Indiana man hear these figures—instead of $21,431,225, the State of Indiana would pay $86,022,000, which would multiply her tax burden more than fourfold. I think, friends, you want to be looking at this pretty carefully before you launch upon a policy of this kind, because, after all, you have a responsibility not only to your country, but you have a responsibility to the folks who sent you here.

This burden to be added to those already breaking under the load of taxation now imposed.

During the last 10 to 12 years the greatest fortunes have been amassed that have ever been known in this country. In the same time more farmers have gone broke than has ever been experienced, more merchants have gone into bankruptcy, more banks have closed their doors, and more losses have been incurred to depositors than ever was known be
| of the Government—Continued fore in the same length of time.

There are more people unemployed in this country than has ever been known before, more hunger, distress, and ultimate disease.

During this same period the excess-profits tax was removed. The corporation tax rates were reduced, and at every turn the load was taken off the rich and they amassed tremendous fortunes.

Compare the picture of these big industrialists with the farmer, the laborer, the small merchant-how different the scene. I oppose the sales tax; it is unjust, unfair, and will be harmful to our people and an injury to our country.

This bill is not fair to the great masses, who, while being unorganized, are hopeful that their duly elected Representatives in Congress will deal with them in a fair and honorable manner. And be it remembered that nothing is settled until it is settled right, and there will be a day of accountability to the people.

I oppose a tax on amusements—on admissions of 50 cents and under. This is the amusement of the common people and the poor. I oppose the tax for that reason, and for the further reason that the picture theaters in the small towns are, like all other small-town businesses, barely able to exist, and any additional tax would close the ones that are yet open. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DICKSTEIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Sandlin] to act as Speaker of the House at the evening session.

NUMBER AND COST OF SALARIES IN THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission heretofore obtained by me, I printed in the Congressional Record of February 8, 1932, a statement prepared for me by the Bureau of Efficiency as to the number and the salaries of Government employees. That statement did not include the number and amount of salaries of employees of the legislative branch of the Government. On the 8th day of February I stated that later I would print in the RECORD the same information with reference to the number and cost of salaries of employees in the legislative branch of the Government.

At my request, Hon. William Tyler Page, formerly Clerk of the House of Representatives and now in the employ of the House, has prepared for me that statement, and I now ask unanimous consent to print also that statement in the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

JOSEPH C. GRISSOM

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplementary report on the bill (H. R. 1668) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Joseph C. Grissom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD figures now being compiled that will show the amount of revenue that would be secured by a 1 per cent tax on sales on stock exchanges and a 5 per cent tax on short selling.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask by whom the figures are compiled?

Mr. BLANTON. They will be produced by the Internal Revenue Bureau in the Treasury Department.

Mr. TREADWAY. They are official figures?
Mr. BLANTON. They will be official figures. They are now being prepared.

They are being prepared by the Mr. TREADWAY. Treasury at the gentleman's request?

Mr. BLANTON. They are being prepared at the request of a Senator who has been collaborating with me on this subject.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask how extensive the publication of the figures will be?

Mr. BLANTON. I presume it will probably cover less than half a page. There will be an attempt made in the House to substitute such a tax on the sales on all stock exchanges in the United States in the place of the sales tax now carried in the bill. Thus the gamblers on Wall Street would bear the burden that the sales tax proposes to place upon the shoulders of the poor people of the Nation.

If in the House we should fail to pass this amendement, I am assured by a distinguished Senator that such a change will be made in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the | insistence, oppose any such repeal or modification, as well gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

RECESS

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired, at 8 o'clock p. m., the House was called to order by Mr. Sandlin, Speaker pro tempore.

PROPOSED REPEAL OR MODIFICATION OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a copy of the Beck-Linthicum resolution and certain constitutional provisions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, touching the gravely difficult and highly controversial prohibition question, these suggestions are made.

PROCEDURE FOR AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

The methods provided for amending the Constitution are to be found in Article V thereof.

ARTICLE V

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of threefourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Thus the methods for amendment are two, as follows: (a) Through the proposal, by the Congress, upon its own initiative, by two-thirds vote, to be ratified by the legislatures of, or conventions in, three-fourths of the several States; and (b) through the proposal by a convention, called by Congress to propose amendments, upon the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, such proposal to be ratified as in (a) required by the legislatures of, or by conventions in, three-fourths of the several States.

In the adoption of the various amendments to the Constitution only the first method has been invoked; the second method has never been called into play.

The repeal or modification of any amendment should not be lightly undertaken. The adoption of an amendment has been made through an elaborate process, and under important and deliberate sanctions. Jointly, the Congress and the States, by more than majority action, have brought about such adoption, and the repeal of a constitutional amendment is in an entirely different category from that of the repeal of a statute. A constitutional amendment, like the original Constitution itself, is intended to be permanent, rather than experimental or transitory. Hence, the repeal, modification, or amendment of any constitutional amendment, or of any other constitutional provision should be approached with the utmost care and consideration. Before the same is finally attempted there should be very strong evidence that the proposal will be ratified by three-fourths of the States. Otherwise the country may be constantly plunged into controversy over futile proposals to amend the Constitution.

There is, of course, a very large body of our citizens who are insistent in their representations and demands for the repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment. On the other hand, a very large body of our citizens, with equal as the submission of any proposal for repeal or modification.

Of course, in any country of free institutions, the people have the undoubted and inherent right, through constitutional processes, to repeal, amend, or modify any law of the land, organic or statutory; and any citizen is within his rights when he urges, in such manner, the repeal, amendment, or modification of any law, organic or statutory.

The Constitution and the amendments thereto were adopted or ratified by the action of three-fourths or more of the several States. Thus far all of the amendments to the Constitution have been ratified under the procedure indicated in (a) heretofore mentioned. The method for ratification set forth in (b) has never yet been invoked, but it is in full force and effect, and can be utilized at any time. The original instrument was ratified by conventions held in the then-existing States.

THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Now, the eighteenth amendment has gone, in its processes of adoption, from the Federal Government; that is to say, from the Congress, down to the States, and has been adopted by the action of three-fourth of the States, speaking through their legislatures; or to be accurate, by 46 of the 48. The amendment having been thus adopted, it would seem that any proposal for its repeal, amendment, or modification, in order to be effective, should be initiated by the States themselves through the method prescribed by (b). If two-thirds of the State legislatures should make application to the Congress for the calling of a convention for such repeal, amendment, or modification, or for the general purpose of proposing amendments to the Constitution, it becomes the duty of the Congress, mandatory in character, to call such convention. When called, the convention will have the same power to propose any amendment as Congress itself, acting purely on congressional initiative, may propose. In either form of proposal, by the Congress or by the indicated convention. there must follow a submission thereof to all the States. Three-fourths of the States must ratify such proposal, acting either through their legislatures or by State conventions, as the one or the other method shall be prescribed in the proposal.

If the legislatures of two-thirds of the States should make formal application to the Congress for the calling of a convention-which will be national in character and will have to be set up in the form which the Congress must provide for—this will be a very strong indication or evidence that the people of the United States wish any particular proposal of amendment of the Constitution involved to be made; and this is the reason why Article V provides that in such state of case the proposal or proposals which may be made by any such convention shall be submitted to the States for ratification.

It is apparent that the form of any proposal made by such national constitutional convention should be of the same general character as that of any proposal which may be, under Article V, submitted by the Congress for ratifica-

As the Constitution fails to provide the methods to be followed in the holding of State conventions for the ratification of proposed amendments thereto, it follows that the States themselves must provide the methods. On the other hand, if and when the Congress, upon the application of two-thirds of the States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution, it is apparent that Congress must provide the method for the holding of such national convention.

Not since the settlement of the slavery question by the arbitrament of the sword has there arisen in the Nation an issue so prolific of bitterness and controversy as is this one of prohibition. There has never been found any ideal plan for dealing with the liquor problem, and no ideal plan may ever be found. When and where may the angle of repose be attained? Of course, complete law observance would bring complete solution; but, for various causes, it has been found impossible to bring about such observance. Hence the endless agitation and controversy.

The chief argument in behalf of the repeal or modification | of the eighteenth amendment is that the liquor question is one for State rather than for national treatment. If this argument is to have weight, should not the States themselves, therefore, initiate any movement for repeal or modification, and in the way prescribed by the Constitution? The States must act as units in dealing with any proposal for amendment of the Constitution. They can now act as units in an effort to effect repeal or modification of the amendment. if they desire such action brought about. If as many as two-thirds of the States fail to unite in their application to Congress for the calling and holding of a constitutional convention for the purpose referred to, how can it be hoped or expected that three-fourths of the States will ratify any proposal for repeal or modification which the Congress, upon its own initiative, might submit to the States? If it may be avoided, should any futile or experimental gesture touching the organic law be made through congressional initiative?

This is not intended as an argument either for or against the question of a so-called referendum on the subject involved. The attempt is here made simply to point out—without entering into the merits of the question—that any formal effort to bring about the submission of any proposal for repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment, under all the facts and circumstances involved, more logically should be initiated by the States themselves, than by the Congress. The question of prohibition has already gone from the Congress to the States, and ratification by the States was made. If the States wish to achieve a repeal or modification, they can bring it back to Congress in the manner provided by the Constitution. Any action not grounded in constitutional sanctions can have, of course, no valid or binding force.

REFERENDA ON PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

In this general connection I express the opinion, long entertained, that if ever there should be had any so-called "referendum" on a question so highly controversial as that of prohibition, a direct vote of the people at the polls would be preferable to any other. It has been my judgment that Article V should be amended so as to provide this additional method of ratification as regards all future proposals for amendment of the Constitution, the States to act as units, as is now required. Accordingly, in the last, or Seventy-first Congress, on July 3, 1930, I introduced a measure (H. J. Res. 396) providing for such amendment of Article V. No action having been taken thereon, in this session I reintroduced the measure (H. J. Res. 333), and the same is now pending before the House Judiciary Committee.

If the resolution should become a part of the Constitution, the Congress, or any national constitutional convention called by the Congress upon application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, could submit to the direct vote of the several States any proposal for amending the Constitution; and a majority vote of each State, as registered at the polls by individual voters, would determine the action of the State as a unit. The present procedure as provided in Article V, touching the requirements that three-fourths of the States, acting as units, must ratify any proposal for constitutional amendment to render it effective, would not be affected by the provisions of the resolution.

Also in my proposal, provision is made that the States shall provide for the holding of the conventions authorized by Article V in the submission of any proposal for amendment of the Constitution—unless the Congress itself shall, by law, provide for the holding of such conventions, having for their purpose the ratification required by Article V. Although any proposal for amending the Constitution may be submitted for ratification, either to the legislatures of the several States or to conventions in the States, the authorization is only permissive in character.

Accordingly the States may decline or refuse to hold conventions for the purpose of considering for ratification any proposed amendment, where the submission may follow the State convention plan of procedure. For this reason, doubtless, no amendment to the Constitution has ever been ratified by the State convention method. The submission of all the amendments has been to the legislatures of the several States. The fact that the legislatures were already set up and provided a simpler mode for ratification has doubtless caused that method to be always followed. Moreover, the fact that no State could be required to call conventions to consider proposals to amend the Constitution doubtless entered into the equation. Thus, to-day, with Article V as it stands, if the so-called Beck-Linthicum resolution should pass the House and Senate by the constitutional two-thirds majorities, I know of no means whereby the States could be compelled to hold conventions for purposes of its ratification; and if State conventions should not be held any such submission would be altogether futile.

Also in the indicated resolution which I have introduced, provision is made that "if any proposed amendment does not become a part of the Constitution within seven years after its proposal to the States, it shall not be operative." This provision is based on the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Dillon v. Glass, Deputy Collector (256 U. S. 368; 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; 65 Law Ed. 994).

The Beck-Linthicum resolution contained no time limit as to ratification, and this constituted, as I view it, a very objectionable feature. Unless a reasonable time limit for ratification is imposed, a proposal for amendment may drag on for an indefinite time; and while, under Supreme Court ruling, a reasonable period within which ratification should be made, is contemplated by Article V, yet unless a definite period is fixed, the question of what may constitute a reasonable period is one which may cause great controversy and confusion. For this reason the resolution I have proposed fixes seven years as the time during which ratification, as regards all future proposals for amendment, shall be made. This period was named in the eighteenth amendment, and in the case just cited the court held the same to be reasonable and valid.

I quote sections 2, 3, and 4 of House Joint Resolution 333, as follows:

SEC. 2. In the case of an amendment which is to be ratified by referenda, such amendment shall be submitted by each State to the electors thereof at a general election after the first general election in such State succeeding the proposal of the amendment. Each State shall conduct the election and determine the result thereof as the law of such State provides, or, in the absence of such State law, as the Congress shall provide by law. Electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. The Congress shall have power to prescribe by law the form in which the question of the adoption of the amendment shall be submitted to the electors.

SEC. 3. In the case of an amendment which is to be ratified by conventions, each State shall provide by law for the ratification of such amendment by a convention held in such State for such purpose, unless the Congress provides by law for the holding of conventions for the purpose of ratifying such amendment.

conventions for the purpose of ratifying such amendment.

SEC. 4. Ninety days after any amendment has been ratified in each of three-fourth of the several States, it shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution. If any proposed amendment does not become a part of this Constitution within seven years after its proposal to the States, it shall not be operative.

The Beck-Linthicum resolution did not, and could not, provide for its direct submission to the voters of the several States. It provided for a submission to conventions in the several States, as is permitted by Article V; but without authority to require the conventions to be held.

Mr. Speaker, I hope to secure a committee hearing on my pending resolution during the present session. I may say that it was introduced for basic reasons and considerations. As a matter of general principle and policy, I have believed that amendment of Article V should be thus made. If this resolution should prevail as a constitutional amendment, any proposal for future amendment of the Constitution could be submitted in the form of direct referenda to the voters of the entire Nation through the several States; and, touching questions of highly controversial character—for obvious reasons, as I see it—this would seem to be the wisest and most effective form of submission. When any great issue—especially one that may affect every home and fireside—is thus brought to the door of every voter in the land, with the privilege accorded him of registering at the ballot box his individual judgment thereon, the resulting action of ratification or rejection, would, as I believe, be accepted by all as being more conclusive of what the people may desire than will be the ratification or rejection by any other method.

THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House of the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Warren in the chair.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, at this time I can only briefly discuss a few of the iniquities of the indefensible sales tax provisions of the pending bill. The question of politics has definitely entered into the consideration of this tax bill, any claims to the contrary notwithstanding. On March 10, 1932, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hudleston] referred to the large Federal Treasury deficit as a Republican deficit and then proceeded to advance arguments in favor of the sales-tax monstrosity which levies a tax on those least able to carry the burdens and which, if enacted, will result in greatly aggravating the present depression and unemployment crisis now confronting our country and our people.

Let us look at a few facts to indicate whether the Republican Party can properly be charged with the Treasury deficit, as some of our demagogic Democratic friends desire in order to enhance the fortunes of the Democratic Party. An honest statement of facts conclusively proves that the Treasury deficit and the present serious financial condition of America is not chargeable to the Republican Party but directly to the Democratic Party. During the last Democratic administration prior to our Democratic World War, the national debt was approximately $1,000,000,000. Under the Democratic administration our national debt increased to the stupendous amount of approximately $26,596,000,000, on August 31, 1919. Certainly the extraordinary increase in our national debt must be laid at the doorstep of the Democratic Party and not of the Republican Party. The extravagance and policies of the Democratic Party were so revolting to the American people that in the election of 1920 the Democratic administration was turned out of office by an overwhelming mandate of our sovereign voters.

The Republican Party was selected by the American people and must be given credit for reducing the Democratic national debt from its peak figure of approximately $26,596,-000,000 on August 31, 1919, to approximately $18,125,000,000 on February 29, 1932. It is true that we have a large Treasury deficit at the present time which does not appear to be diminishing, but, on the other hand, increasing; and the facts will clearly show that the Democratic Party and not the Republican Party is responsible for the present condition of the Federal Treasury, which is used as the vehicle for the Democratic Party to bring before the House for consideration this sales-tax monstrosity, for which the war profiteers and other multimillionaires of the country have been clamoring. Our Democratic brethren try to place the blame for the present stupendous cost of operating the Federal Government Treasury deficit on the Republican Party when only a brief consideration of a few of the facts clearly shows that they are deliberately intending to deceive the American people. It is true that we are spending over $4,000,000,000 a year out of the Federal Treasury. which expenditures, by reason of the depression and decrease in revenue, have resulted in a deficit of over a billion dollars. If we look into the current appropriation bills we find an item of $640,000,000 for interest and an item of $426,485,000 to take care of maturing bonds of our national debt. We also find an expenditure of over a billion dollars to take care of the World War veterans, their widows, orphans, and dependents, who fought in our Democratic World War. Certainly these expenditures of over $2,000,000,000 can not be laid to extravagance of the Republican Party when they directly and unmistakably are the result of the World War which we entered and conducted under the Democratic Party.

No one who has been denouncing the Republican Party for causing the increase in cost of government and the present Treasury deficit can point to any piece of legislation or appropriation under the Republican administration resulting in a cost on the Treasury that the Democratic Party, or any great number of its members, opposed. In fact, if all of the legislation and appropriations sponsored and advocated by a majority of the Democratic Party under the Republican administration were enacted into law, such as the debenture and other political schemes, the Treasury deficit at the present time would, no doubt, be more than $5,000,000.000. Many of our Democratic brethren, from the floor of the House and on the stump, have tried to blame the Republican Party for the unemployment and depression, not only existing in this country but in every country of the globe, because of the enactment of the protective tariff bill. The Democrats have talked much about the iniquities of the tariff bill and the great detriments to our people by reason of such tariff, and when they obtained control of the House of Representatives, the body in which tariff legislation must originate under the Constitution, they have failed to report to the House any bill which reduces in any shape or manner even one of the existing Republican tariff rates which they complain about. They, however, pass a camouflage piece of legislation which provides for no reduction of tariff rates. which they claim exorbitant, but enters into a league of nations with reference to our tariff matters, in compliance with the well-recognized League of Nation doctrine of the Democratic Party, notwithstanding its repudiation by the American people in the 1920 election. And then we find the sorry spectacle of our Democratic brethren claiming to oppose the protective tariff bringing to the floor of this House, with a favorable report, the pending tax bill, which not only places an additional tariff of 21/4 per cent ad valorem on practically all importations now carrying tariff rates as well as those on the free list, and in addition imposes on a revenue bill a tariff provision of 70 per cent ad valorem on crude and fuel oil and a 25 per cent ad valorem on gasoline in the name of raising revenue, although testimony furnished by the Treasury Department indicates no revenue would result because the rates are prohibitive and practically an embargo.

These same Democratic brethren who are advocating a 70 per cent ad valorem tariff on crude and fuel oil practically all voted against the little 20 per cent ad valorem tariff on shoes which was so necessary to protect the great shoe industry of America and the American workers employed therein from unfair competition of cheaply produced foreign products.

As a Republican protectionist I assure my Democratic brethren, who are crying for tariff on oil, that I shall be very glad to support an adequate protective tariff on that commodity provided it is brought in as it should be as a tariff bill and not as a rider on a revenue bill in the name of producing millions of additional revenue, when, on its face, it will not produce any, because of its embargo nature. The millions of American people who operate automobiles as a necessity, not as a luxury, should certainly resent the oiltariff provisions of this revenue bill. The operators of these automobiles not only pay their license fee and personal property tax but, in many States, excessive State gas taxes, and now, under this bill, they will have to pay the sales tax on their new autos in addition to an increased sales tax on the fuel and oil which they consume.

Since this Government postponed the payment of debts owed to us by foreign governments over a long period of years at a sacrifice of many billions of dollars to the American taxpayer, which loans were made under the Democratic administration, we could certainly increase the national debt to take care of the present deficit instead of foisting upon the American people this iniquitous sales tax, particularly in view of the wonderful record of the Republican Party in extinguishing the Democratic debt since we have been in view of the fact that over $2,000,000,000 of the present deficit is directly the result of the Democratic war as I have previously indicated.

I am one of those who believes that, if it is necessary to wipe out the Treasury deficit at this time by taxing the American people, the pending bill could be amended so as to do so without placing the burden upon the backs of the people who are least able to carry it. Under this iniquitous bill, many of those without a substantial income or without a job are taxed on the very necessities of life. The man pounding the pavements looking for a job must pay the sales tax on the shoes and clothes which he wears; the bill provides for a tax on the fuel and gas used in the American home; it even provides for a sales tax on the ice which is so essentially necessary; it provides for a tax on canned fruits and vegetables; it provides a tax on the cereal used by millions of already undernourished children, as well as on their clothing; it provides for a tax on their sausage and frankfurters and provides for a tax on the baby's carriage and nursing bottle, while the luscious porterhouse steaks and the fresh fruits and vegetables of the multimillionaire are not subject to such tax.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] eloquently pictured the conditions confronting our people and country to-day as comparable to our Nation's last war. Why is it, then, that the poor people who are now only keeping body and soul together and who are tramping the streets out of employment should be burdened with this iniquitous sales tax? Is it because it will receive the approbation of those multimillionaires who are best able to pay? If we are to now balance the Treasury by taxation, let us be reasonable and write a tax bill which will cause the least harm to our country and our people. The sales tax and tariff provisions of the bill should be stricken therefrom, and the income-tax rates on individual incomes as well as the inheritance and gift tax rates in the present bill should be greatly increased. [Applause.]

In the time of the World War, which is the direct causation of the present economic catastrophe confronting the nations of the world, the very lives of our citizens were taken by the Government in order to successfully carry on the conflict. Certainly if the present peace-time emergency through which we are now passing is comparable to the World War emergency, as so eloquently pictured by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Huddleston], it would not be unjust to greatly increase the rates on those best able to pay. Can it be that this man-created Mammon in time of this great peace-time emergency has more rights than Godcreated man in time of war emergency, whose very life is taken from him in order to preserve our institutions and our people? Why can not this Congress write a just revenue bill if these funds must be raised by taxation at the present time in order to balance the expenditures of the Federal Government? Page 7 of the committee report indicates that an income tax, under the present bill, of an unmarried citizen having a net annual income of $1,000,000 would be $439,710, leaving him, mind you, a net income after paying the tax of $560,290. If this peace-time emergency is comparable to war-time emergency, should this Congress allow these single persons with net incomes of $1,000,000 to retain $560,290 of it in order to keep body and soul together, exempt the fresh, fat, juicy porterhouse steaks which he eats from the sales tax, as this bill does, while taxing the sausage and frankfurters consumed by the poor man who perhaps has a net income of less than $1,000 and has five or six hungry children to feed and clothe to keep body and soul together? This bill would exempt the fresh peas and other fresh vegetables which this poor downtrodden single person with a net income of over $1,000,000 consumes, while it taxes the canned peas and vegetables which might be used to feed the hungry mouths of the children of the poor, many of whom now have no net income. It would take many days to picture a small fraction of the iniquities of this sales-tax measure, and if the Democratic Party is to claim mothership and the Republican Party fathership to power following the World War period. This is logical in | this illegitimate, unequitable, cruel, and inhuman tax on misery and despair, I can see that a new political party will be born in the near future.

The inheritance-tax rates and gift-tax rates should be greatly increased, and those who have accumulated vast fortunes should be the first to recognize the necessity and justification for such increases. They should not become drunk with power and wealth and fail to realize what happened in Russia. The rank and file of the American people have been very patient, but the time might come when the yoke would become too burdensome to bear, the same as it did in Russia. If for the security of the Nation and our people the human lives of our citizens are taken in time of war emergency, certainly there should be no objection to greatly increasing the individual income, inheritance, and gift tax rates in time of this peace-time emergency.

I want to particularly call to the attention of all fair-minded Members of the House what I believe, and know you will believe after you consider all of the facts, to be one of the most indefensible provisions of the sales tax as embodied in this bill. I particularly refer to excise tax on wort and malt appearing on page 228. You Members from the farm districts who have been trying to help the farmers by sponsoring legislation to take care of their surplus, as well as those interested in the consumer's standpoint, should hesitate before you support this provision. Due to the low duty of 40 cents per hundredweight on malt imported from Canada, as against the Canadian duty of 75 cents per hundredweight on malt exported from the United States into Canada, and the fall in the Canadian currency, the American manufacturers of malt have suffered immeasurable hardships. The United States Tariff Commission is now investigating the importation of malt from foreign countries, and it is expected that they upon careful consideration of all of the facts will recommend an increase in the tariff rates. If that increase is not granted, many malt manufacturers in this country will go into bankruptcy with the result that thousands of workers will be added to the long list of unemployed, and a great market for the American farmer's grain will be closed. [Applause.]

To briefly show a picture of the problem confronting the American malt industry I incorporate in my remarks a letter from one of the many Wisconsin malt manufacturers. dated December 29, 1931:

Manitowoc, Wis., December 29, 1931.

Hon. JOHN C. SCHAFER.

Hon. John C. Schafer,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: An alarming situation is facing us since England went off the gold basis and United States money commands a premium over Canadian funds.

Due to the low duty of 40 cents per hundredweight on malt imported from Canada, as against the Canadian duty of 75 cents per hundredweight on malt exported from the United States into Canada, shipments of malt into the United States from Canada, which previous to 1930 were practically nil, have increased rapidly and have run as high as 100,000 bushels per month. This threatens destruction of the market on barley for our farmers, who are already suffering, due to an insufficient market for their grain and already suffering, due to an insufficient market for their grain and the low prices obtained for the same. At the same time it is endangering the existence of the malting industry, now already seriously hampered, due to the limited market for its product.

During the month of October there was imported into the United States from Canada nearly 20 per cent of all the malt shipped to domestic consumers during the month of November, due to the low prices at which Canadian maltsters are able to sell. They have an advantage in being able to purchase barley in Canada at lower prices than obtained in this country; their labor costs are under those in the United States, where wages in the malting industry have not been reduced and the union scale of wages is being paid.

A situation already bad before England went off the gold basis threatens to force the closing down of malting plants now operating unless quick action is taken through some emergency measure. Exports of malt from the United States have declined to a considerable extent during the past two years, due to monetary conditions in foreign countries and the high tariffs which have been placed on importations of malt into those countries which formerly purchased supplies in the United States.

As a result the sales of this company, which ran as high as 4,400,000 bushels per annum previous to 1930, during the past two years have been reduced to 2,700,000 bushels.

To end this business depression and unemployment in the United States it is essential to stop leaks. We here have a concrete example which can be alleviated by an emergency measure to prevent Canadians shipping barley and malt into the United States.

During the past several years malting barley has commanded a higher price in the United States than other grains, per pound basis. The present price of the same is 60 cents per bushel of 43 pounds. Take from the farmer the malting demand for barley and it would sell on a feed basis, which is from 15 to 20 cents less per bushel.

We submit the following figures taken from the 1931 operations of our malting plant, showing disbursements for wages, freight, fuel, supplies, etc.

Cereal Products Co.'s disbursements for the year 1931 Wages paid_ $254, 557, 80 Grain purchases, principally barley; some rye and wheat______1,749,039.76

Bituminous coal, anthracite coal and coke (used for power, drying, and roasting purposes)	86, 545. 11
Freight on shipments of grain to plant	258, 980, 40
Outgoing freight on manufactured and by-products	167, 872, 00
Cotton grain bags	29, 000, 00
Sundry supplies	9, 969. 40
Advertising expense	6,500.00
Insurance premiums on grain and plant	22,000.00
Plant improvements	76, 293. 22
Local taxes	14,000.00
Repairs to machinery plant, and equipment	20 482 92

The above represents only one unit of the malting industry.

It is quite evident from these figures that unless something is done to prevent the Canadian malting industry from destroying our market, not only will the farmers' market for malting barley be destroyed, but railroads will suffer a serious loss in revenue; unemployment will be further increased, and other lines of business will suffer from a loss of patronage up to the present time derived from the malting industry. The railroads will also suffer the loss of freight revenue on shipments of coal, coke, grain, etc., into malting plants.

We are submitting the above data to you, and earnestly pray for relief and assistance, which should be quickly available in an emergency of this kind.

Yours very truly,

CEREAL PRODUCTS CO. F. A. MILLER, General Manager.

I also incorporate the following table, concerning the importation of barley malts, which was furnished me by the United States Tariff Commission on January 14, 1932, and which indicates the extraordinary increase in the importation of foreign malts produced from the grain of foreign tillers of the soil.

Mr. Chairman, the proposed manufacturers' excise tax on malt sirup should not be passed for the following reasons:

Subdivision D of section 601, title 4, of the manufacturers' excise tax provides-

(d) In the case of the following articles the tax imposed by this title shall be at the following rates:

(2) Brewer's wort, liquid malt, malt sirup, and malt extract, fluid, solid or condensed, if containing less than 15 per cent of solids by weight, 5 cents a gallon; if containing 15 per cent or more of solids by weight, 25 cents a gallon.

All brewer's wort contains less than 15 per cent of solids by weight and will under the provisions of paragraph (2) be subject to a tax of 5 cents per gallon.

Malt sirup or malt extract, which is the same product, is manufactured from malted barley and as marketed in sirup or powdered form contains more than 15 per cent of solids by weight and will under the provisions of paragraph (2) be subject to a tax of 35 cents per gallon. Malt sirup is marketed by the pound, and not by the gallon; the average weight of a gallon of malt sirup is 11 pounds.

Malt sirup is a food product, an essential ingredient in the manufacture of bread, and should be exempt from the provisions of the manufacturers' excise tax, the same as flour, sugar, and salt.

There was manufactured in the United States during the year 1931 approximately 385,000,000 pounds of malt sirup, or 35,000,000 gallons. Of this amount, over 100,000,000 pounds of malt sirup was used by the baking, breakfast food. textile, and drug industries. The remaining 285,000,000 pounds was sold in 3-pound cans and used in the home for baking and other domestic uses, including the making of home-brew. Malt sirup has been used by bakers in the making of bread for more than 30 years and is used to-day by practically every commercial baker in the United States. It is used by the breakfast-food manufacturers in the preparation of their food products and by manufacturing druggists for pharmaceutical purposes. It is also used by the textile industry in large quantities for desizing purposes.

The proposed tax on malt sirup is unjust and an unfair discrimination against the baking, breakfast-food, textile, and drug industries.

Malt sirup is sold in bulk to the baking, breakfast-food, textile, and drug industries at an average price of 6 cents per pound. The proposed tax on malt sirup of 35 cents per gallon amounts to a little over 3 cents per pound, or 50 per cent of the sale price. Such a tax is unjust and oppressive and penalizes the above industries to the extent of more than $3,000,000 a year for the privilege of using malt extract in the manufacture of necessary and legitimate products.

The total revenue to be collected for a year for the proposed tax on malt sirup and brewers' wort will be less than one-third of the estimated $15,000,000, if we use the amount of malt sirup and brewers' wort sold during the year 1931 as a basis for computing the revenue which the Government will receive for the first year under the proposed tax, as we find the following:

Thirty-five million gallons of malt sirup, at 35 cents per gallon, $11,250,000; 50,000,000 gallons of brewers' wort, at 5 cents per gallon, $2,500,000, making a total of $13,750,000.

Can any member of the Ways and Means Committee or any Member of the House present any valid reason, if the 21/4 per cent manufacturers' sales tax is adopted, why malt manufactured from the American farmers' grain and consumed by the American people, as I have heretofore indicated, should be singled out to carry a 50 per cent sales tax, while all other sales taxes are but 21/4 per cent?

I respectfully submit that sufficient revenue can be raised to make up the Treasury deficit by increasing the individual income, gift, and inheritance tax rates, and legalizing the manufacture and sale of a good, wholesome, nonintoxicating beverage, containing not more than 2.75 per cent alcohol by weight, with a special excise tax levied thereon. No member of the Ways and Means Committee and no Member of the House who supports the 5 cent per gallon sales tax on brewers' wort can consistently oppose such special excise tax from the prohibition standpoint.

I challenge any Member of this House to name one specific purpose for which brewers' wort can be used except to manufacture beer. When you vote for this tax on wort you put your stamp of approval on wildcat breweries manufacturing a beverage which contains far more than 2.75 per cent alcoholic content, by weight, for consumption by the American people. If you defend your position in favor of the extortionate sales tax on malt sirup and brewers' wort on any ground whatever, you must necessarily take your position on the ground that you are taxing by indirection what you do not have the intestinal stamina to tax by direction.

I want it to be clearly understood that I am not defending wildcat brewing and that I am not one of the many American citizens, in these days of prohibition frenzy, who pays 25 cents for a glass containing a few mouthfuls of wildcat brewery beer, or 50 to 75 cents for a bottle of the same beverage, which is made by hijackers, rumrunners, bootleggers, and tax evaders at the present time, and the making of which will be sanctioned by the Congress of the United States if the special sales tax of 5 cents a gallon on brewers' wort which is in this bill becomes law.

I am of the firm belief that if a beverage containing not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol, by weight, would be authorized and a special excise tax levied thereon, that between four and five hundred million dollars annually would come into the Federal Treasury as revenue and also at the same time the total amount paid for brewed alcoholic beverages by the American public. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Fulbright].

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee. I desire to voice my emphatic protest against that feature of the pending revenue bill which calls for the imposition of a sales tax. I am opposed to such a tax because I think it is vicious in theory and destructive in its effect. It is repugnant to the Jeffersonian theory of government, and is a direct offspring of the fertile brain of the Hamiltonian. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on this bill during the past few days, and have studiously scanned the Congressional Record to find some substantial reason for the imposition of such a tax. Summing the whole thing up in a nutshell, the only reason that carries any weight, that I have been able to find, is that it is necessary to balance the Budget. Since when has it become a sacred and binding obligation to balance the Budget within one year? What great disaster will befall this Republic should we not succeed in balancing the Budget through taxation within one year? Where is the prophet who has been able to picture the tragedy that would result? What statesman has been able to convince us with clarity and logic that disaster will follow if we fail to balance the Budget within one year?

What assurance have we that the Budget will be balanced should we pass the pending tax bill imposing this vicious and inequitable tax? If the orgy of waste and extravagance that has been pursued by the present administration is to continue, this revenue bill will not and can not balance the Budget. The argument that we must balance the Budget at once is panicky in its effect and is intended to drive us blindly into the support of a tax that is repulsive, unjust, and un-American. I believe in placing patriotism above party affiliation and the welfare of our country above personal ambition, but I think more of humanity and the oppressed people than I do of balancing the Budget. [Applause.]

It did not become imperative that the last Congress balance the Budget through taxation, but since the Democratic Party obtained a meager majority in the House, three of the anointed, Messrs. Hoover, Mellon, and Mills, chose us to rake their chestnuts out of the fire. I am ready to go to any length in the interest of my country, but I can not follow the leadership of these triplets in a movement to enslave the common people. The sales-tax provision in the present revenue bill is a dangerous and untried departure from the fiscal traditions of this country, reversing the theory that taxes should be collected from those best able to pay and in proportion to ability to pay.

To-day there are approximately 9,000,000 workers in the ranks of the unemployed. Adding to this number the dependents, we have an army of probably 30,000,000 people without income. Some of them drawing from what little reserve they had for sustenance, the remainder subsisting upon charity. This bill saddles on the United States what it undertakes to call a "manufacturers' tax" of $600,000,000, the major portion of which will come from the pockets of the already overburdened farmers and wage earners of the country. Already the purchasing power of 70,000,000 of our people has been greatly impaired or wholly destroyed, yet you seek to impose upon them this tax to increase their misery and poverty.

If prosperity is to be restored in this country, the purchasing power of all the people must be restored. This can not be done by shifting the burden of taxation upon those who are least able to pay. The proposed tax is, in effect, a per capita tax, not a property tax.

To-day approximately 90 per cent of the wealth of this country is owned by 5 per cent of the people, according to the statements of reliable economists. Under the operation of the manufacturers' tax, so-called in this bill, which is in fact a sales tax or consumers' tax, the 5 per cent of the people who own 90 per cent of the wealth will pay only 5 per cent of this $600,000,000 tax to be imposed. Such a vicious and inequitable proposal to my mind is outrageous if not a crime, and especially so coming at a time when the people who will bear 90 per cent of this burden are either facing bankruptcy or are in poverty and distress.

The future of this country can be secure only when we have a happy, prosperous, and contented citizenship. We are far from this to-day. It is no time to trifle with the people. At a time when everything should be done to relieve distress and restore buying power, are we going to take action to decrease it? The present administration destroyed our foreign trade through the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. Shall we Democrats now become a party to the destruction of industry at home? Let us face about and in equity and good conscience give attention to the common man. The moratorium has been passed, which meant tax relief for foreign countries and tax increase for America. We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, which means tax increase for the masses and debt relief for the few. We passed the Glass-Steagall bill, which gives relief to bankers. In fact, relief has been attempted for every group that has been instrumental in bringing on the depression in which we are found, and now an attempt is made to penalize the common man, innocent and helpless, to raise the money for the relief of these various groups and to balance the Budget.

From 1922 to 1932, inclusive, the Treasury Department shows that cash refunds, credits, and abatements in connection with income, excess-profits, and inheritance taxes amounted to approximately three and one-half billion dollars. This money was tendered back largely to such interests as the Aluminum Trust, the Steel Trust, the oil industry, and the immensely rich, and after every reasonable deduction and abatement had already been made. Had this money been retained, we would to-day have a surplus in the Treasury and not a deficit, but it has been handed back to these contributing angels of the party in power. These are the parties who should pay the major part of the taxes that are necessary to balance the Budget. The passage of a sales tax of this kind would be the crowning glory of the high priests of privilege and plunder, and would sound the death knell to the ambitions and aspirations of the common people of this country.

I was interested the other day by a statement made by a gentleman relative to the Demagogues Club. Referring to the farm bloc, he said, "You took $500,000,000 of the people's money belonging to all the people and you put it in the hands of a board and you commissioned that board to juggle the market, to buy, to sell, to organize, to incorporate, and to manipulate the prices of farm products." In behalf of the farmers I want to say that there never has been a piece of legislation passed by this Congress that embodied the wishes and desires of the American farmer. The tariff barons have always written their own legislation or had it written by their friends.

The great industries dictate their schedules, either prepare them themselves or have them prepared by their friends, but the farmer has never been permitted to write his legislation nor have his friends been permitted to write it for him. Before the bill above mentioned, carrying the appropriation mentioned and creating the Farm Board, was passed, it was gutted of everything that the farmer had asked for. It was not his measure and it was not the production of his wisdom or intelligence. It was not the product of the farmer or the farmer's friend.

He then attacked the soldiers' group of the club. Among other things, he said, "They are not willing to take $600,-000,000 from all the people of the country, as provided by this sales tax, yet they are raring to take $1,800,000,000 of the people's money and distribute it among the soldiers." I say is to have any personal application unless so stated. do not know how extravagant the soldiers' bloc may be, if at all. I will say, however, that I have as much faith and confidence in these boys in civil life in times of peace as I did while they followed the flag. They made their contribution to the lasting credit of this Republic in the late World War, and they are making their contribution to this country now, and I am more concerned about them and their welfare than I am the profiteer who pillaged and plundered while these boys were offering their all on their country's altar. These boys never faltered in line of battle and will not whine when taxation is just.

I still hear the echo of the bugle call, the drumbeat, and the tramping of millions of feet at the training camps and cantonments. I see the ships of destiny as they carry the boys across the sea 'mid the lurking perils of the submarine. I see them land on a foreign soil and rush to the battle front. In the face of every instrument of death that human ingenuity and the genius of man could devise they assumed their place in that mighty orgy of blood and carnage. The poison gases, machine guns, and heavy artillery failed to check their onslaught. At Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, the Argonne, and all along the Hindenburg line their acts of bravery and deeds of daring stunned the allied forces and broke the morale of the Hun. Amid this unparalleled tragedy of the world's history they seized the pen of destiny and, dipping it in the sunset glow of the autocracy, wrote on heaven's blue above them the matchless splendor of American valor and the deathless glory of American arms. Shall we forget them now in the face of such a record as this? Shall we forget their superb courage and matchless achievement? Shall we forget the sacrifices made and the patriotism with which they served? Shall we forget the widows and orphans of the fallen heroes who followed the flag? No; in God's great name, no.

Lord, God of Hosts, be with us yet, Lest we forget, lest we forget.

[Applause.]

But let us get back to the sales tax. To-day the poultryman is selling his eggs at 6 cents a dozen. He will be required to pay a sales tax on the crate. The dairyman is selling his cream at 17 cents a pound. He must pay a sales tax on the can. In fact, the farmer who is to-day compelled to sell staple farm products at less than the cost of production must pay a sales tax upon most of the things he eats and everything he wears. The laboring man, with a wage upon which he and his family can scarcely exist, must pay a sales tax upon his overalls and shirts, his hat and shoes, and everything that his family wears. Such a tax will place a burden upon these people that they can not carry. It will result in consternation, chaos, and demoralization. The power to tax is the power to destroy, and when you seize upon the sales-tax theory you are wielding the weapon of destruction. Let us balance the Budget by strict economy, by eliminating waste and extravagance, by limiting appropriations to necessary and meritorious purposes, by abolishing the useless boards and commissions that feast upon the Public Treasury, and by eliminating duplications and overlapping agencies of government. In short, by reducing the cost of administering the affairs of this Government. If we will do this, a fair and equitable revenue bill will suffice. The Budget can then be balanced. In my opinion, no greater calamity could befall the people of this country than the passage of a revenue bill imposing a sales tax. Let us adhere to that just and equitable theory that taxes should be collected from those best able to pay and in proportion to ability to pay. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration is perhaps the most important piece of legislation that will come before the present Congress. I want it understood at the outset that I do not approach this debate in any Pharisaical, sanctimonious, or "holier than thou" spirit. Neither do I claim any monopoly on patriotism, and I hope it may be understood at the outset that nothing I hold hearings for something like a period of 30 days, and and I shall endeavor not to reflect upon nor impugn the motives of those who disagree with me, and most assuredly, I shall not ridicule either the living or the dead.

It is with sincere regret that I find myself in disagreement with a majority of the members of the Ways and Means Committee, of which I have the honor of being a member. I am, however, comforted with the thought that I am standing upon the traditional principles and policies of the Democratic Party and upon the platform upon which I have ever stood in opposing the sales tax and other provisions of the pending revenue bill. It is also pleasing to observe that a majority of the Democrats of the House are in opposition to the bill as it is written. Also many Republicans.

On December 9 last, the President of the United States, in transmitting the Budget to the Congress, advised us that there would probably be a deficit of over $2,000,000,000 for 1932 and a deficit of $1,417,000,000 for 1933, also that there had been a deficit for 1931 of $903,000,000.

It seems that this was the first time the President had awakened to the seriousness of the financial condition of the Treasury. He also stated in this message that it would be necessary for the new Congress to undertake immediately the task of raising additional revenue to balance the Budget for 1933. The reason I say this was a recent decision arrived at by the President is that the New York Times on September 30, only about two months before the Congress convened, carried the following news item, quoted in part:

Washington, D. C., September 29, 1931.—The White House to-day made it known that President Hoover has reached no decision as to whether a program of tax revision looking to a larger Government revenue will be submitted to the December Congress.

If this serious financial condition was known to the administration earlier-and I maintain it was or should have been-the President should have called it to the attention of the last Congress or should have called the present Congress into extra session a year ago in order that we might have dealt with the situation and provided additional revenue to prevent the deficit of 1931-32 as well as 1933. We could then have enacted legislation increasing income and inheritance taxes, and also enacted the gift tax carried in the pending bill. This would have given us for the fiscal year 1932 the income taxes for the calendar year 1931, as well as other taxes that could have been collected up to June 30, 1932. Had this action been taken by the President, it would not now be necessary to resort to some of the radical and extreme provisions carried in the pending bill, to which I shall refer later.

By waiting and withholding this important information from the Congress until December last the administration has put the Congress in a very serious and embarrassing predicament. Nothing was done whatever by the administration to prevent the deficit of $903,000,000 for 1931, and it is now too late, of course, to prevent the deficit around $2,000,000,000 for 1932. The administration and the Treasury officials were "asleep at the switch" or were unwilling to meet the situation promptly, and the people were being deceived with the periodical and ever-recurring statement that prosperity was "just around the corner."

But the truth will out, and finally a year too late to prevent the deficit of 1931 and 1932 the President and the Secretary of the Treasury disclosed to the Congress and the country a financial crisis in our Government that is unpre-

On January 13 last the Committee on Ways and Means began a series of hearings preparatory to writing a tax bill to provide for the proper functioning of the Government. At the first hearing by the committee the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, appeared before our committee and read or caused to be read, by the Hon. Ogden Mills, at that time Under Secretary of the Treasury, an estimate that approximately $920,000,000 of additional revenue would be required to balance the Budget in 1933, not including the debt-requirement fund.

On the basis of this estimate the committee proceeded to after the hearings were concluded on February 16 this estimate was changed by the new Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, to $1,241,000,000 with the explanation that, "Owing to marked changes that have occurred in economic conditions since the time the original estimates were made, revenues would decline $321,000,000 more than was anticipated." This report stated further that the same changes in economic conditions have necessitated revision of the estimates of the additional revenue that would be yielded by the taxes outlined in the Treasury program of December, resulting in a reduction of $134,000,000. Thus it is shown that the estimates of the Treasury varied to the astounding figures of $455,000,000 in less than two months. It seems that these errors and discrepancies have been common and chronic with the Treasury Department for the past 10 years, and the variation of several hundred million dollars is of little consequence and to be expected.

The Treasury Department resolutely contends that if the Budget is not balanced the economic structure of the Government will be seriously impaired or destroyed. I maintain that the Treasury and the administration are inconsistent, if not insincere, when they demand that the Budget be balanced in order to prevent economic disaster. If it be true that to fail to balance the Budget for 1933 will produce dire results prophesied, then it was equally true for the years of 1931 and 1932. Yet the administration and the Treasury Department remained silent while the deficit of 1931 was accumulating and raised no alarm until one-half of the fiscal year of 1932 had expired and until it was too late to prevent a deficit for either of those years.

If any dependence at all can be placed in the estimates of the Treasury, and if the danger of not balancing the Budget is as great as now claimed, then I assert that the administration is guilty of criminal neglect and infidelity to the American people for not sounding the alarm in time to have prevented the deficit for 1931–32. If they can tell now what the deficit is to be for 1932–33, then it must be true they could have told one year ago what it would be for 1931–32.

Had the Congress been called into session in March or April of last year, the Republicans would have organized the House and would have been in charge of every branch of the Government. It was only as result of changes that have occurred in the House membership since last summer that the Democrats were able to organize the House.

It is manifestly true that so far as any party can be responsible the Republicans are responsible not only for the serious economic condition that prevails throughout the country to-day, unprecedented in all our history, but they are also responsible by neglect, if not dereliction, for the deficits that have occurred and are in prospect; so at least it must be evident to everyone, and should be proclaimed to the world, that the present economic depression and the present economic condition of the Treasury are Republican afflictions.

The truth is the Budget was balanced in 1929 and 1930 when the financial crash came, so a balanced Budget did not prevent the present economic debacle we are experiencing, and there is no evidence that a balanced Budget will either mitigate or cure the evils from which we are intensely suffering. The trouble is deeper than that. I realize that the Budget should be balanced at the earliest date reasonable, considering, of course, the depressed condition of the country and the ability of the people to pay increased taxes, but no one is prophet enough to tell at this time what additional tax will be necessary to balance the Budget for 1933.

It all depends upon the business conditions. If they improve, as is hoped by all and claimed by many, the taxes now imposed, with increases carried in the pending bill on incomes, inheritances, gifts, and so forth, should raise sufficient revenue to balance the Budget for 1933.

To show how inaccurate and unreliable the Treasury officials have been in the past in estimating Government receipts and expenditures, I give the following facts and figures:

In past estimates they have made the following errors:

ı	For 1923 the Treasury estimated a deficit of	$822,000,000
ı	For 1923 there was a surplus of	309, 657, 460 1, 006, 657, 460

ı	An error of For 1926 the Treasury estimated a surplus of	182, 505, 238 262, 041, 756
ł	The surplus was	377, 767, 817

So, from this exhibit, would we be justified in taking the Treasury estimates as a safe guide or justification for raising the full amount claimed necessary to balance the Budget? When we have in the past prepared revenue bills we have ofttimes heard our honored Speaker [Mr. GARNER], also our distinguished floor leader [Mr. RAINEY] severely criticize and ridicule Treasury estimates, and we know full well that they have in the past flatly refused to accept as a safe basis for legislation estimates of the Treasury Department. Moreover, to my certain knowledge, ex-Senator Simmons, of North Carolina, a distinguished Senator from our State for 30 years and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee for 10 years, never relied on the estimates of the Treasury in preparing tax bills. It is also a matter of record that the late Senator Jones of New Mexico, while a member of the Senate Finance Committee, stated in part:

I will say a word, however, with reference to surplus which was estimated by the Treasury Department. I have lost all faith in Treasury estimates. When I look back over the history of the adjusted compensation bill—bonus bill—I find that whenever there was even a thought of that legislation being enacted there came from the Treasury Department the most pessimistic howl that ever came from a responsible source. Some estimates were made varying more than $1,000,000,000, varying from a surplus of over $300,000,000 to a deficit of $822,000,000.

For the first time in the history of the House of Representatives the Ways and Means Committee has prepared and brought before Congress a revenue bill embodying as one of its main features a general sales tax, levying 2¼ per cent on nearly 150,000 articles of trade and commerce with only a few exceptions.

Previously sales taxes have been levied only as war measures and have always been limited to a restricted class of commodities. Now for the Federal Government in peace times to adopt a general sales tax is a new departure in Federal taxation that is wholly unjustified either by the condition of the National Treasury or the ability of the people to pay.

The first effort to impose this nefarious tax system on the people of the country in peace times was made in the other body in 1921, when certain Senators sponsored a similar provision. However, it was overwhelmingly defeated by a Republican Senate, and a Democratic minority stood in solid phalanx against it; but, alas, we now have the anomalous spectacle of the Ways and Means Committee of the House yielding to the persuasive voice of Andrew Mellon, former Republican Secretary of the Treasury, who has been trying to foist this tax policy upon the country for the sole purpose of relieving the wealthy of the payment of income, inheritance, and other taxes.

The bill we are now considering has many good features with which I am in hearty accord. I approve the provision increasing the tax on incomes, inheritances, and gift taxes, as well as some of the excise provisions. I also heartly approve the administrative changes of the bill by which probably more than $100,000,000 annually will be saved.

The provisions of the bill relating to theaters and moving pictures should be modified so as to exempt all those with admission charges of 50 cents and less. The motion-picture industry is an amusement particularly for the poor, and the low-priced ones should not be taxed.

But it is the abominable sales-tax provisions of the bill that make my support of it impossible. In my opinion, one of the prime causes of the present depression, and, perhaps, the greatest, outside of the unjust, inequitable, and burdensome legislation enacted by the Republican Party for the last 10 years, has been the heavy load of taxation the people of the Nation have been compelled to bear—heavy national taxes, heavy State taxes, heavy county and municipal taxes—taxes galore in every direction, and the proponents of this measure say that the way, and the only way, to restore prosperity is to lay on the bending and broken backs of the ordinary and poor people of America still additional

The strangest remedy that I have ever heard or that has ever been advanced to cure a panic and restore prosperity! Why has not some one thought of this before? Why was it necessary to enact Reconstruction Finance Corporation legislation, the legislation providing for additional assistance for the Federal farm banks, and the other remedial measures? Why did we not increase taxes at the outset? How absurd, how ridiculous! With eight or ten million people unemployed, manufacturing establishments idle or running on short time at a loss, with agriculture prostrate, with banking institutions of the country by the thousands in the hands of receivers, economic scourge spread throughout the country like a "pestilence that walketh in darkness or a destruction that wasteth at noonday," we propose as our remedy the indefensible, unheralded, extreme sales tax. It is claimed by some that this sales tax is so small that it will not be felt; but I say it will not only be felt but it will be a serious burden upon the American people, especially those least able to bear it. It is estimated that this tax will raise $600,000,000 per annum, and counting a population of 120,000,000, this would be an average tax for every person in the United States of $5. Allowing five persons for the average family, this would be $25 additional taxes on the average for every family in the United States.

This afternoon we heard two able speeches by members of the Ways and Means Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member. One was by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Hill] and one by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. If what the gentleman from Washington said in his 20-minute speech on this bill and the sales-tax provision be true, then it should never become a law. If what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] said concerning this legislation be true, it should have been a part of the taxing policy of our Government from its very foundation.

I had always been taught that we had statesmen in the United States who were able to cope with our economic problems. I had understood that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, was a wizard in financial legislation. [Applause.] I had understood, my friends, that he could work wonders and perform miracles; but when we came to the task of raising this additional $500,000,000 revenue, they imported a gentleman from Canada by the name of Jones, and he was here for several days before that committee. I do not know just how long he was here. They then reported this marvelous sales-tax provision which is now a part of the pending revenue bill.

Now, my friends, it is not patterned after the Canadian system. They say the Canadian system has worked wonders. I have here a copy of the Canadian law.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman tell us whether William Randolph Hearst had anything to do with bringing this man Jones down here?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I can not tell the gentleman, but I know that William Randolph Hearst has been one who has tried to get the sales tax adopted in the United States for several years.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] traced the sales tax back to Rome and Greece and Egypt. I thought that was a very unhappy suggestion. Are we to follow in the footsteps of Greece and Rome and Egypt and pattern after those nations of antiquity in our financial matters?

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Did the gentleman finally trace it to India, where they place a sales tax on the loin cloth which Ghandi wears?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Well, the gentleman chased around in such a crooked path so long that I could not tell exactly where he did go. [Laughter.] I know in his desperation to justify the sales tax and to square himself with his inconsistent position he traveled around a great deal. There is not a man who has made more speeches on the floor of the House of Representatives, since I have been a Member, against unjust taxation than the gentleman from Illinois. I was really astounded, but not surprised, that he was driven to such a desperate position to justify his course.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is reminded of what happened to Greece and Rome in those days?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I am reminded. And I am reminded of a quotation from the Bible which applies exactly in a case like that: "Woe to that nation which is built upon blood or established upon iniquity." [Applause.]

If we walk in their footsteps or if we pattern after their example, then their woes will be our heritage.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. There is not anything in any statement that Thomas Jefferson made that was in favor of a sales tax. Is that not the fact?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, no. When driven to desperation. he cited Thomas Jefferson. Of course, Shakespeare said that Satan could cite scripture to prove his contention. There is always justification for every wrong act.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. How much was the total revenue raised in Canada per year under the sales-tax provision?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I think about $70,000,000, perhaps.

Mr. SCHAFER. Was not a great percentage of that raised by a tax on distilled and fermented beverages?

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the gentleman will meet me on the top of the Washington Monument on Christmas night, I will discuss that question with him. [Laughter and

I have before me a copy of the Canadian sales tax, and, my friends, the Canadian sales tax is not any more like the sales-tax provision of the present bill than night is like day. The Canadian sales tax is nothing more than a tax on luxuries, while there are seven closely printed pages of exemptions, and practically everything which could be classed as a necessity is exempt. Let me read to you a few of the exemptions:

Brick of all kinds, for building houses and churches; castings of iron and steel; chains; coils; chain links; milking machines; cultivators; plows; farm implements; mowing machines; spring and dusting machines; hay loaders; incubators for hatching eggs; scythes; sickles; threshing machines; separators; mowing machines; windmills; portable engines; equipment for generating electric power; machinery and apparatus used exclusively for washing and treating coal; well-digging machinery; machinery appliances of iron and steel, made in America; articles exclusively used in metallurgy; machines made exclusively for handling ore; ore crushers; diamond drills; coal-cutting machines; pumps; vacuum pumps; machinery for sawing lumber; all sawmills; logging machinery; blocks and tackles.

Also all foods and food products.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. At the time this Canadian sales tax was passed, the people of Canada were not groaning under the burden of a high protective tariff as the American people are

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course not: and they did not have such a large percentage of the rich who were trying to escape the just burdens of taxation and shifting them to the shoulders of those not able to bear them.

Under this bill the farmer with no market for his products, or none equivalent to cost of production, will be forced to pay this sales tax on all of his farm implements, farm machinery, farm tools, on the furniture, bedclothing in his home, the cookstove upon which his meals are prepared, the cradle in which his baby is rocked, and on hundreds of articles he must purchase too numerous to mention. The laboring man who works for a daily wage, when he can find a job, will find this tax assessed against him in practically every purchase he makes. In fact, those least able to bear this tax will be afflicted with it from the cradle to the grave. It begins with the cloth in which the infant is wrapped when it comes into the world, it attaches to the milk bottle and toys of the babe in the crib, and does not end with the coffin and shroud, but clings to the tomb of the dead. At every turn of life's pathway the invisible tax collector will demand and receive his "pound of flesh."

This being true, it is not surprising that the farm organizations of the country, without exception, are denouncing and condemning this proposed sales tax and that the American Federation of Labor is also up in arms against it. The cunning sophistry of the proponents of this bill does not deceive or mislead them, but its advocates endeavor to sugarcoat it and get it down the throats of the American people by claiming it is only a temporary measure; but, my colleagues. I warn you now as to the dangers connected with this departure from our traditional American policy of taxation. If this policy is once approved, I predict it will never be discontinued. It was stated on the floor of this House on Saturday last by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON], of the Ways and Means Committee, and one who helped prepare this bill, that if the principle of the sales tax is adopted it will never be repealed. This statement threw consternation into the camp of the proponents of this bill, but it was the truth, and I commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Warson] for his candor and frankness; that is the great danger of ever establishing this vicious policy. The large income-tax payers, with all their facilities for propaganda through the subsidized press, paid magazine writers, ability to employ the ablest talent in the country to lobby around Washington, will undoubtedly be sufficiently potential to prevent the repeal of this legislation once it is

Now is the time, and the only time, in the interest of the American people to kill it; and I predict now that the salestax provision of this bill will never become a law. If we do not kill it in this House, we will mortally wound it and send it on to the other body bleeding and staggering, where it will be killed so dead and buried so deep, it will never be

Another effort made by the proponents of this sales-tax legislation to soften the blow and deceive the people is the claim that it will not be passed on to nor paid by the ultimate consumer, but that it will be absorbed by the manufacturer or retailer. The truth is, however, in most cases it will be paid by the consumer and may at the same time be passed back to the producer of the raw material and collected out of him, thus doubling the tax. Monopoly will certainly be able to pass it on and also to pass it back. The small manufacturers, most of whom are now running at a loss, will, if they continue to operate, be forced to collect it out of their operatives in the way of reduced wages. Competition in some cases may compel the retailer to absorb the tax: but that will also be harsh and unjust, as |

Practically everything you would class as a necessity is he is now struggling for existence. This tax will certainly be paid, and by those who are least able to protect and help themselves. It will bear with pitiless severity and merciless cruelty upon the poor, the weak, the humble, and lowly of mankind.

> The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, now ranking Republican on that committee, in his speech on this bill made the extravagant prophecy that, if this bill is enacted into law, that prosperity will immediately be restored, and stated we would at once cross the Red Sea into the "Promised Land." In this statement the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is running true to Republican form.

> We were told for many years that all that was necessary to guarantee prosperity was to keep the Republican Party in power and adopt its policies. Positive assurance was given that if the Smoot-Hawley bill were enacted, we would be panic or depression proof. We were told that if the Hoover farm-relief measure, creating a Federal Farm Board, were adopted, the farmer would be brought up to the level of industry and that he would be made permanently prosperous. Instead of agriculture being brought up, industry has been brought down into the valley and shadow of economic death with agriculture.

> They promised bread and gave a stone; promised a fish and gave us a serpent; and having defaulted on every promise they had made, they now promise the "Promised Land." Well, they certainly have qualified us all in one way. We are all experiencing great tribulations.

> In conclusion may I say I am just as jealous of the honor and credit of our country as anyone and willing to vote all taxes necessary to preserve and protect its credit. Our difference is one only as to best method of accomplishing this end; but I am sure, notwithstanding our differences and disagreements, the highest aim and most fervent desire of every Member of this body is that our Government may continue in the future, as in the past, to exalt truth, righteousness, and justice, and that it may be a shining example to all the erring nations of the earth, until the final consummation of all material things.

> Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott].

> Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, to say the least, it is somewhat embarrassing for me, a neophyte in this House, to follow as worthy a man as the gentleman from North Carolina. I hope, however, to make up in the spirit and sincerity of my remarks what they may lack in quality.

> We in Michigan are a patriotic people. We like to feel that we are taking our part in the Nation's business. We like to feel that we are assuming our part of the national responsibility, and I think in this case the delegation from Michigan, at least speaking for myself, are proud that we are Members of a Congress which has shown the fortitude, which has shown the courage that this Congress has in presenting its legislation. It takes courage for a man to come from a State which pays into the Federal Treasury four dollars for every two dollars it takes out and speak in behalf of this bill. It takes courage, my friends, to speak in behalf of any tax bill, for that matter. It takes courage, perhaps, for me, neophyte that I am, as I have said, to come down here in my first session of Congress and vote to levy a tax on my district of something like $510,000, but I hope the time shall never come when I put my district or myself before my country, and I know that my people do not expect me to do so. [Applause.]

> I am not particularly interested, and I do not think the people of my district or the people of this country are particularly interested in which party is to blame for this condition or whether any party is to blame for this condition. I do not believe the people of our home districts are interested whether this is a Democratic measure or a Republican measure. They are interested in the solution of the problem, and I think it behooves all of us to forget politics for a few days, to put aside the bickerings and the banterings of partisanship, and sit down as a unified Congress and work out the destinies of this Nation. Never before in the history of this Nation has there been such a need for harmony in Congress as there is at the present time with respect to this particular bill. [Applause.]

I dislike to vote for any bill which is going to tax my people and your people. There is a saving grace, however, to this bill which I have not heard called to your attention as yet. I have one county in my district which is particularly hard hit. It is a county in the southern part of the district which borders on the great county of Wayne, in which is located the city of Detroit. The people in this county are factory workers and office workers and proprietors of small businesses, dependent largely upon the automobile industry for their very existence. These people are home owners or are buying homes on our Michigan plan of purchasing under contract. I looked the other day in my home-town paper, and the list of tax sales in that paper covers a section which resembles the magazine-feature section of a Sunday paper. Thousands and millions of dollars. if you please, of property is being sold next month for taxes. Now, you say to me, how do you expect this sales-tax bill to benefit that situation or to relieve that situation, and this thought comes to me.

These people are losing this property because they can not pay the taxes. Now, why can not they pay the taxes? It is because the tax rate in the State of Michigan, as it is in all States of the Union against real estate, is exceptionally high. It is because the burden of taxation is largely carried on real estate.

I am fundamentally opposed to a sales tax, not the theory of it—I have not studied the merits of it and I am willing to bow to the experts on the Ways and Means Committee that it is a desirable form of tax to meet the present emergency. I believe a great many of them are in doubt as to whether this is the ideal form of permanent taxation, but I take the attitude that if there is going to be a permanent sales tax, it should be left to the States to levy that sales tax against real estate in lieu of the real-estate tax; and the only redeeming feature in this bill that I see, and the one which will cause me to vote for it, is that it will automatically cease to exist at the end of the fiscal year 1933. It is an emergency tax and must be considered solely as such.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to suggest that the gentleman did not mean to say "desirable," but rather to use the word "necessary."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did, yes; thank you.

Now, I can see other ways and means of raising taxes. I can not see any more logical or sounder way of raising them during this emergency than that provided in this bill.

I have criticized, in my ignorance possibly, the fact that this Congress and the great Secretary of the Treasury found it necessary to include in the yearly Budget the sum of $426,489,000 which you gentlemen a few years ago provided he should include to retire the national debt. I have been told that during the years 1923 to 1929 we overpaid that obligation about $3,000,000,000, and I said:

Now, why can we not take advantage of that payment. If I am buying my house on contract and I pay a year in advance and then can not meet my obligation for the current month, I am not worried, because I am still 11 months ahead on my obligation.

So I thought, of course, the Government was that much ahead on its obligation and that we were $3,000,000,000 in the black when we started, and even with a Treasury deficit of $2,000,000,000 we would still be $1,000,000,000 in the black; but the fallacy of this soon came to me, because I found that we would have to balance the Budget as we went along if we were to maintain the integrity and stability of our national credit.

This brings me back to the proposition of this real-estate tax. In the county of Macomb there are outstanding to-day $5,000,000 worth of drain bonds. I had hoped and prayed that the Glenn-Smith bill would reach the floor of this House and be passed many days before this to relieve that situation. In your wisdom you have found it should not be brought onto the floor of the House, and, because I am a neophyte, I bow to your seniority and say that maybe you are right. The only thing which saved that county from financial ruin was the decision of the Supreme Court of Michigan which recently set aside those bond issues and held that they did not have to pay it because the bonds are illegal. Assuming that condition existed and continued, the people of Macomb County would have to issue $5,000,000 worth of bonds to refund that bonded indebtedness; and how would they raise it? They would have to sell bonds on the open market.

Certain gentlemen in this House have advocated a bond issue as a means of paying off this deficit.

Now, I am not a banker, and I have not studied finance except to try to keep my own bank account balanced, and that has been hard enough, I can assure you, but I know, as a fundamental principle of bond salesmanship, that you can not sell municipal bonds, State bonds, county bonds, city and township bonds for any greater amount than you can sell Government bonds, and I know that in Macomb County to-day, because of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in his remarks this afternoon, in which he said that a great many of the United States Government bonds are selling to-day for 85, the treasurer of Macomb County or any other county in the United States could not sell its bonds for any greater amount; and what I am emphasizing is simply this. If we do not balance this Budget, the people of your district and my district will find themselves in the position in which Macomb County would have found itself had it been obliged to refund its bonds. in that they would have had $750,000 additional obligations added to their budget which they could raise only by further levies against real estate, much of which I have already shown is being sold for taxes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Michigan five additional minutes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, coming in here a new Member as I did, I have purposely taken no part in the deliberations on the floor, because I did not think I would have very much to offer. It is easy to criticize, it is easy to stand up here and talk against a sales tax, but it takes courage to vote for it, and I hope we have that courage. [Applause.] It perhaps did not take any courage for any of you worthy gentlemen who have been in Congress a great many years to create the obligations which we must now retire; it did not take much courage to vote for the appropriations for the Wilson Dam, the Roosevelt Dam, the Coolidge Dam, and the Hoover Dam, which have for their purpose the irrigation of arid lands in the West. It would take courage, possibly, for you to vote an equal amount for the drainage of the Midwest States, 20 per cent of which is under water.

We did not object to creating the obligation, because we were in favor of it at that time and thought that these appropriations, in benefiting the great States of Colorado, California, and Nevada, would materially increase the wealth of the Nation and would increase the wealth of the State of Michigan. I did not object to it until I found that the last appropriation would open up 2,000,000 acres of tillable land which will be, when under cultivation, in direct competition with every other acre of tillable land in the United States, including the rich lands of my district.

And while we are talking about deficits let us give some attention to the surplus of agricultural products caused by these investments. [Applause,]

I have taken the attitude that we should not vote one more cent for irrigation and reclamation until we have drained some of the property of the Midwest States, the owners of which already have a fixed investment. We are willing to go along with you, because the debt has been created and it has ceased to be a question of why you did it; it is now a question of whether this great country of ours is going to maintain its high standard of credit.

If my child contracts a fever I do not say to myself, "I! know where he got it-he ought not to have gone out and wet his feet." He has a fever and the thing for me to do is to call in the doctor. The condition exists no matter what caused it. The doctor in this case is this sales tax.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I call to the attention of the gentleman from Michigan that when he states that 2,000,000 more acres under the Hoover Dam may be brought in direct competition with agricultural tillable land, that he is mistaken, as not more than 560,000 acres of additional land can be supplied with water for irrigation from the storage at Hoover Dam. Congress will not be asked to appropriate money to bring the water to this additional land until agriculture is again placed on a prosperous basis.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Well, I may be wrong in my figures. My authority, I thought, was authentic; but regardless of whether they are right or wrong, the principle is the same.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman's point is clear. When the people had large incomes, Congress took notice of the situation and provided for Boulder Dam and appropriated for the reclaiming of the Mississippi Valley by the construction of levees. That was when the income tax law seemed adequate. When money is coming in it is an easy way to raise money, but when incomes decrease there is not enough.

Mr. WOLCOTT. We know that if we advocate the drainage of the Midwest States we have got to get money with which to do it. We know that if we are to carry on these works we have got to have the money to do it. Taxation in some form is the only way governments have of raising money.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.
Mr. SCHAFER. I want to call the gentleman's attention that there is another proposition, where a $483,000,000 Treasury deficit was created, because the Secretary of the Treasury said that the tax on licensed beverages for consumption in 1919 amounted to over $483,000,000.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to-night more to make a conciliatory statement than to make an argument. Unfortunately I was called from the proceedings of the committee at the time the consideration of the sales tax began. We have had several weeks of hearings and had set ourselves to the task of drafting this bill. We had completed the rates on the income, inheritance, and corporation taxes, and then two subcommittees were appointed, one upon the administrative features of the bill and the other upon the question of the sales tax. We who were on the subcommittee on administrative features soon completed our work.

The men on the subcommittee on the sales tax were, of course, required to do much work through a long period of time. I have never yet seen a committee approach a subject with more concern than these men did. That was my experience when I was associated with the committee, and I know it to be true after I left the committee. Whether we like it or not, we might just as well face the issue in this session of Congress that we have a Budget to balance. I do not care what the argument of any man is upon the floor of this House-and I have listened to them all for the instruction they have given me-if we are in any measure to restore prosperity, if we are to bring back normalcy in this country at an early date, the most potent thing we can do is to immediately balance the Budget of the United States Government. Oh, I know it is an easy thing to set up a printing press and start printing paper money. I know it is an easy thing to float bonds and sell them, if you do not care anything about the price they bring or the price to which they descend, but what is true in an individual business is true in the Nation's business. You can not, either technically or practically, bring your expenses and your income to a balance by continually giving promissory notes or extending bond issues. Let us forget our passions, let us forget our prejudices, and look at this situation squarely in the face. As Members of the Seventy-second Congress, irrespective of party affiliations, we know that if we are to serve our country as the proper kind of Representatives of a great and God-fearing people, we have to do the business thing and balance the Budget of the United States Government. [Applause.] Talk about voting taxes! Oh, I detest the job, and so do you.

My good friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], together with other men I see on the floor of this House, at one time in this Chamber faced the solemn duty of calling from the humble homes of this country the best blood and bone and sinew, sending them to a foreign land in order to fight a foe and fight for friends they had never heard of or dreamed of before. That was a solemn vote. That was a nasty vote, politically speaking, for a man to cast, and an eminent man stepped down from that high position as Speaker and walked into the well of this House and faced his President of the United States and refused to do it. It is a bad thing to have to call the boys of this country to arms. We had those votes, but did any man hesitate? Some of them did, but the great majority of this House rose and said, " will pass those war acts which will be beneficial to this country." Voting taxes on anything or anybody is a hard job, but I am saying to you as one who has not taken any part in this argument up to this moment because of my own immature consideration of the bill that you may as well face the issue as it is, because you are going to vote them whether you like it or not. I am not trying to force anything down your throats, but if you do not like certain features of this bill you can eliminate them and send us back to the committee room, but whenever you send us back there, remember that you send us back there with instructions to bring in a bill here that will increase the taxes of the taxpayers of the United States, because we have to raise revenue.

There are two ways in which to balance a budget. Let us all use our common horse sense. Whenever a business man or an individual finds at the end of the year that he is running at an expense that he can not keep up financially. what does he do? He usually sits down with the members of his family and says:

In order to balance our family budget we have to do one of two things or we have to do a little of both; we have to either increase our income or reduce our expenses, or we have to bring up our income a little bit and reduce our expenses a little bit.

Let us look at the first part. There are members of the Appropriations Committee here who can check me up if I am wrong, but, as I remember it, the expense of this Government for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year will be over $5,000,000,000. Twenty-five per cent of that amount is expended upon public officials and the offices of public employees in this country. I have just recently returned from a trip that burrowed about 1.200 miles into the interior of this country. On that trip I had two or three men mention the tax question to me. I had one man who said that he favored the kind of tax that we have here, but he did not want a general sales tax, and the others said they would try to bear it the best they could. But I had 25 men say that the expenses of this Government were so stupendous that it was up to us here to cut down and pare to the bone our governmental expenses.

I have heard a lot of blowing on both sides of the aisle and from members of the Committee on Appropriations about reductions that have been made there and prospective reductions of $150,000,000. That is not a drop in the bucket. It took our side of the House two or three hours the other day to almost wipe out that entire reduction by the passage of the $132,000,000 road bill that we knew did not have any more chance of becoming a law than had a crippled grasshopper in a pen of hungry turkeys. [Laughter and applause.] Now, if that is not reducing the expenses of this Government with a vengeance I do not know what I am talking about.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas 10 additional minutes.

Mr. RAGON. I have every confidence in the world in the special committee that has recently been appointed to look into the reduction of expenditures in this Government. That committee, as I understand, will come in with some kind of a report or bill next week. I know it is going to be interesting to watch the vote of some of the Members upon the report or the bill which that committee will introduce, because if I am correctly informed, it is going to cut clear down to the bone.

Now, that is one of the ways of meeting the Budget of this country. Instead of our having done anything to contribute toward balancing the Budget along this line up to this good hour, we have on the contrary, my friends, increased the cost of Government in this present House for the fiscal year ending in 1932.

Mr. Chairman, I say that you can not excite the interest of business men in this country until you give them confidence that this Government is on a stable financial plane, and whenever they are assured that the affairs of our Government are stable and we will not go off of the gold standard, then we will have that confidence; we will recapture that confidence that has been the basis of the prosperity we have had for the last few years.

Recently I was in Arkansas and I had a conversation with a gentleman there who stated to me that in his town, a prosperous little city, there was a bank with over a half million dollars in its vaults and that the merchants in that town and the influential farmers of that community were suffering, and that the men who owed the merchants in that community were being pressed by the merchants because they did not pay their bills. I asked him to what did he attribute this. He said there had been over a hundred bank failures in that State, and that the reason of those bank failures in the other cities and towns was that the people were in a frenzy of nervousness and that this bank had to retain this money which it would otherwise throw into the channels of commerce in order to meet any prospective run. So what did it all amount to? It amounted to a lack of confidence upon the part of the bank, in its ability to procure aid in a crisis from larger banks, and the situation was further complicated by a lack of confidence by the people of that community in the strength of that bank, and as a result of this the Federal reserve banking system in that particular area or district must suffer thereby. When the entire Federal reserve system is nervous by reason of these conditions, its stabilizer must be a full Treasury. I say to you it becomes our duty as Representatives of a great people to do something that will stimulate confidence in the financial system of our country.

We have provided in this bill an income tax which I think is the highest that has ever been initiated in this country in peace time. I think the inheritance tax goes as high as we could possibly expect it to go. I think we are getting very close to the point in income taxes where we will experience a diminishing of returns. Then we go to the corporation tax. If you will get the records and see the number of corporations that have suspended business this year I doubt seriously that you would subject the Ways and Means Committee to criticism for increasing this from 12 to 13 per cent. as we do in this bill. Then we come down to the various excise taxes that are inserted for the first time in this bill. I do not want to discuss them, because I am trying to eliminate everything to come to one point. I say to you frankly I have heard Members from different sections get up and discuss one of these excise proposals. My friends, you are after revenue. I do not care whether you call something a tariff or a tax; if we are driving for one point for common good, what difference does it make which road we take, just so we get there?

Then we come lastly to the bone of contention in this particular bill, and I will make it as brief as I can, because I do not want to trespass upon the time. I say to you frankly if you are going to balance this Budget and do justice to American industries—and I am measuring my words—you will never do it save and except through the instrumentality of a manufacturers' excise tax.

I am sorry I can not go as far as the committee has gone. I will be frank with you there. I think we could have more or less restricted the scope of this taxation or the base of it. Frankly, when we come to consider the bill under the 5-minute rule I propose to do that on certain articles and on certain phases of the bill. But I am so impressed with the importance of balancing the Budget that I say, "Forego any prejudice you may have for or against the sales tax and look the situation squarely in the face and let us cut out what we think would have a bad psychological effect upon the country and keep in those things that are worth while." Then if the volume of the tax returns is not great enough, let the committee come back under their rules and get the rest of these taxes.

You may want me to be specific, and I can be. I think that certain things, like cheap clothing, might be added to the exemption. I can not get the consent of my mind—and I say this with all due respect to everybody—to place a tax upon the clothes of the man who is looking for a job—on his shoes and on his socks. Do not get too much consolation out of that statement, because I do not think the tax would amount to much. It is not the money taken away from him that I am complaining about, but I say to you, my friends, that the finest spirit that was ever manifested beneath the bending dome of God's heaven has been manifested in the United States during the last 10 months. [Applause.]

During that time there have been 7,000,000 men destitute of employment. They have had hanging onto the ragged edges of their clothing helpless women and children, crying for something to eat, yet we have not had a single uprising in this country that amounted to the snap of your finger.

I say to you, I am like Brother Andrew Brown. I believe a whole lot in what he calls "psyrology." I think the worst psychology that could go forth in this country is the fact that the American Congress has put upon these unemployed people a tax in their destitution. I say the same thing about food, but that has been largely eliminated. If they take out the item of lard and one or two other things, it will help the bill.

Then there is one other thing, and I will not enumerate any more. That is the question of admissions. My friends, do you know there are 25,000 theaters in this country? Do you know that to-night over 5,000 of them are dark and that practically 20 per cent of them are closed? Yet a bill is brought in which will put a tax upon those admissions of less than 50 cents. I think if that hits anybody in this country, it hits the man of average means. This should be remedied.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. RAGON. Now, gentlemen, if I were called upon to do so, I could specify many items which would fill the gap that might be made by the elimination of the items to which I have referred. I could fill that gap with three items, and every one of them ought to be incorporated in this bill. I have particular reference to the tax on stock sales and transfers.

I am not a demagogue. I am not running around here hollering to tax somebody, but if there is anybody on God's green earth who is able to pay a tax it is the fellow who goes on the New York Stock Exchange. I say to you that if you will charge him one-fourth of 1 per cent you will treble the amount of tax you will get under this bill. [Applause.] If you want to cover short-sellings, if you will make it one-half of 1 per cent, you will get $150,000,000, and that will more than cover the elimination of the items I have referred to, such as cheaper clothing, shoes, socks, and so on. There are other items. If you want to go farther, eliminate consolidated and affiliated returns that are incorporated in this bill, and you will get $60,000,000.

They are just two items. I could name a half dozen more, but I am simply calling your attention to these things.

Men, aside from all that, eliminate, if you want to, these small features I have mentioned and you will still retain the main crux of your manufacturers' excise tax, and that, to my notion, has got to be resorted to if we are to properly balance the Budget by 1933.

So to-night my only appeal to you is this: Lay aside your prejudices. Somebody has said it is surrendering a principle. Many of you men voted to send American boys to foreign fields to fight and maybe to die for their country. In doing that many of you voted against your principles, but the emergency which existed at that time called for such action. So I say to you, in this dire emergency of our country, as much as I might dislike the sales tax or manufacturers' excise tax, I will certainly lay down that principle for the safety and the security of this great Government which is my security for a peaceful place in this civilization of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY].

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I want to address myself to the Member who is asking himself the question: "What effect will an affirmative vote for the oilimport tax have upon the consumers of my district?" We proponents of the oil-import tax recognize that proposition at the outset, and recognize the difficulties, real or apparent, that are involved to the Member in determining his vote. The danger is more apparent than real.

There is an authoritative way to ascertain the facts upon almost any subject, and there is an authentic answer to this question

The hearings before the Ways and Means Committee developed the fact that in 52 representative cities in 1926, when crude oil was $2.04 per barrel, the average price in these 52 representative cities was 18.04 cents per gallon; and when the average price of crude had made a horizontal descent of 84 cents a barrel to $1.02 per barrel, a survey of the same 52 representative cities, which included cities like Newark, N. J.; Roanoke, Va.; Springfield, Mass.; Salt Lake City; Mobile; New Orleans; Portland, Oreg; and others, showed that the price of gasoline not only had not depreciated as a result of the terrific loss the producers of crude had taken of 84 cents a barrel, not only that it had not depreciated, but that the average was 18.39 cents per gallon, or a general rise of 0.20 cent per gallon.

You all know that you have paid 35 cents a quart for lubricating oil ever since you bought your first automobile, whether crude oil was 10 cents a barrel or $3.50 a barrel.

One of the witnesses in behalf of the oil-import tax was asked the direct question by a member of the Ways and Means Committee at the hearing, "What will be the effect upon the consumers of refined-oil products in the United States if we put a tax or embargo on these imports?" and every member of the committee sat up and took notice, because it was of interest to him in determining how he should cast his vote. The witness first gave the illustration of the 52 cities that I have just described, and then he added that the members of the committee were all familiar with the fact that the market price of wheat did not perceptibly change the price of a loaf of bread, which, like a gallon of gasoline, is the yardstick of estimate to the consumer, was practically the same price per loaf when wheat was 25 to 50 cents in the Middle West and on the general market as it was when wheat was $3 a bushel.

So let us not be dismayed at the possibility of the effect upon the consumer of gasoline by the gallon. We say it will not adversely affect him to any appreciable extent, but rather let us look to the more far-reaching effect of giving the big monopolists whose enormous profits have been made from imports a strangle hold not only upon the oil industry first, but later upon the oil consumers. Let them complete their monopoly by destruction of the independent oil men, and then you will pay through the nose, and the consumers of gasoline in your district will pay through the nose likewise.

We people of the Middle West from the oil States want buying power. Give us buying power and we will buy the products of New England. We are good spenders—we have been charged with being profligate spenders in our prosperous days. Let me remind New England that when the oil business was prosperous we bought goods from New England at their own prices, plus the protection put upon them by the tariff laws that they so zealously advocated. Obviously, we can not have any buying power when oil sold in 1931, when the glut of South American imports was coming in full blast, at 5 and 10 cents a barrel. The speaker sold oil all during the summer of 1931 at 19 cents a barrel. And statements from all authoritative sources are to the effect that oil can not be produced for less than $1 a barrel, and no one even attempts to deny that. The average price now is 77 cents a barrel. How can we have buying power to buy the goods of New England, the backbone of the opposition to this import tax if we are producing our oil at a loss? Does the opposition of New England mean that it does not want the vast market that flows from the prosperity of 22,-000,000 people of the United States? Obviously not. Even as uncertain a debater as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Martin], who at length on the floor of this House echoed the monopolists, the price fixers, the false propagandists, would not answer in the affirmative.

You may argue that business in New England is stagnated. We answer that business in the oil States is paralyzed and bankrupt. Would you continue to keep dormant, and finally to destroy, this great market for your goods by echoing the false propaganda sent out by the selfishness of the great importers? Surely the gentlemen have not provided themselves with the facts but have been merely "yes men" for the falsities promulgated by those who are making 50, 60, 154, and 400 per cent annual net profits, as are the big importers that are trying to stifle the independents.

The gist of this whole situation is stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Treadway. Unlike his colleague, Mr. Martin of Massachusetts, and Mr. Nelson of Maine, who did not see fit to provide themselves with the facts with reference to this matter, but who rather echo the false propaganda of the monopolists, Mr. Treadway listened intently to every word on this subject that fell from the lips of the witnesses on both sides before the Ways and Means Committee, and after hearing all the facts he was convinced against his first impression, and in the Record, in his statesmanlike speech on the subject, he said that the claims that the additional cost to the eastern coast would run as high as $100,000,000 are ridiculous and can not be borne out by any authoritative evidence that was submitted to this House.

Assuming, however, that the entire additional tax of 42 cents per barrel is added to our fuel bill, this is not out of proportion to the additional possibilities of sale of our industrial products to the section of the country which is asking for this help. If that section of the country can come into our market with its fuel oil, payment can be made in our products, and we ourselves would be the direct beneficiaries in the employment of labor for our home industries.

This is the difference between men who inform themselves and those who not only do not inform themselves but permit themselves to become the channels for misinformation. I leave it to the fair-minded Members of the House as to who is the safer counselor and guide.

We have answered in every conceivable manner the argument that the effect upon the consumer would be adverse. We have answered the arguments of New England, not only with the facts but with the language of one of its longest experienced and ablest Members. One piece of false, obviously deceitful propaganda was echoed on the floor by Mr. Martin of Massachusetts, and possibly it would be wise to show its falsity and fallacy. He stated that the Rockefeller interests have a large quantity of stored petroleum and that the effect of this legislation would be to put money in the pockets of the Standard Oil. If this legislation is for the benefit of Standard Oil, why is every vulture of propaganda that can be employed by Standard Oil directed against it?

Why were Pan American, Standard of New Jersey, Gulf, and all the cutthroat monopolists ably represented by the Ways and Means Committee? Why are they circulating hired emissaries among the farmers to circularize Congress with so-called farmer's letters in opposition? Why should the Oil Trust store oil in the United States when it is making at least 75 cents a barrel on every barrel that it imports? The suggestion answers itself. They are using their own sins and bad reputation as propaganda in favor of the greedy monopoly that they are so loath to give up. There is much storage oil in this country; much of it stored at the price of $3.50 a barrel is still awaiting a market, and the market is 77 cents per barrel. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Guyer].

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am gratified that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Disney] has so lucidly discussed the relation of this tax bill to the oil industry; an industry which, under usual circumstances and in normal times, employs directly and indirectly, about a million men; an industry which occupies one of the most important positions in our economic fabric. While, in my opinion, this measure does not place a sufficient tax on imported petroleum and petroleum products, it does put a tax on them which will not only raise revenue but will at the same time save a great industry from the ruinous competition of imported petroleum and its derivatives.

The proposed bill before us, section 601 (d) (4), reads:

Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and gasoline, imported into the United States, 1 cent a gallon.

This provision is one of the principal reasons why I expect to support this bill. I do it in the hope that it will aid in rehabilitating an industry whose former prosperity and magnitude have, in this time of crisis, prevented a correct and adequate understanding of its prostrate condition.

The petroleum industry has heroically endeavored by proration and curtailment to solve its own problems. Every move of this kind has been met by vast and increasing importations which have nullified these attempts of the industry to protect itself. Finding its difficulties could not be solved by its own efforts it appealed to Congress to place a tariff on imports of oil and oil products. Again it was denied relief, and now as a last resort it pleads with us to impose this excise tax on imports of petroleum and its products to save one of our greatest industries from further disaster, and at the same time set in motion the wheels of industry over the great Southwest where this industry is the lifeblood of business, the principal employer of labor, and one of the most important purchasers of supplies which come from every avenue of trade.

I do not approve of everything in this bill, and probably every Member of this House can honestly say the same thing; but if we wait until we get a bill here that will suit everyone, and particularly a tax bill, so far as such legislation is concerned we might as well adjourn. Uncle Joe Cannon once said about tax bills:

Everybody is willing in tax measures to take the boil off his own nose and annex it to the other fellow's nose.

That is a homely but most intelligible statement of the classic and historic gesture of "passing the buck." "After you, my dear Alphonse." We are all perfectly willing to "let George do it." It is mighty easy to vote against a tax bill, but often it requires courage of a high degree to vote for one. It is also easy to vote for a staggering appropriation that drains the Treasury, but it requires courage to do the patriotic thing—to cut appropriations for the sake of the public credit. Sacrifices must be made by all alike not only to raise revenue to wipe out the deficit but to lower the burden of taxation by economy in appropriations, by the abolition and consolidation of bureaus and commissions, and by the reduction of the salaries of Federal officials.

In 1925, in speaking against the increase of salaries of Members of Congress, I said:

The increase in the cost of Government, Federal, State, and municipal, has shamed the prophecy of the pessimist. At the present time the cost of our Federal Government for one year exceeds the entire cost of the Federal Government from 1790 to 1861. The increase in the cost of government, State and municipal, have been alike prodigious.

The farmer, the business man, and the laborer have taken big cuts in their incomes and wages, and it is no injustice to ask Federal officers and employees to likewise take a reduction. All alike must bear their burden to balance the Budget and buttress the public credit. Its impairment would be a national tragedy. A century and a half ago Washington and his incomparable advisers, Hamilton and Jefferson, established the public credit, and, though it has been often strained and shaken, it has never fallen. If we are to uphold the ideas and ideals of those three superlatively great and patriotic statesmen, we, like the people of that day, must be willing to pay the price that falls to our several lots.

I am sure that 75 per cent of the Members of this House become poorer every year they stay here, but I would not so reflect upon the moral integrity of the membership as to suggest that it is here enduring the strain of the duties of the office for the money there is in it. I have a higher conception of their characters and of the patriotic impulses that inspire the actions of men whom I see breaking daily under the tension of this nerve-racking service to their country. But we, too, must set a high example of personal consistency by reducing our own salaries to help reduce the cost of government and the sooner balance the Budget and likewise the sooner remove the necessity for this extraordinary system of taxation in this national emergency. In doing it we should forget, even on the eve of a presidential election, our political alignments and join with those of opposite political faith to compass this imperative national objective—the balancing of the Budget.

In doing this we have illustrious examples: One day, near the launching of our Government under the Constitution, Alexander Hamilton met Thomas Jefferson in front of President Washington's residence in New York. Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, told Jefferson in his eloquent manner that the very existence of the Union depended upon the national assumption of the debts of the States and of those contracted by the Continental Congress in the prosecution of the Revolution. Hamilton knew that no country was any stronger than its public credit. He explained to Jefferson that the country had no credit and no money, and that to establish the credit it was necessary to pay the country's debts-in other words, to balance the Budget. Jefferson invited Colonel Hamilton to dinner the next evening and had for his other guests two Congressmen from Virginia. There the whole question of the establishment of the public credit was thoroughly discussed. Later, these two Congressmen furnished the votes necessary to pass in this House the bill for the assumption of the Revolutionary debt. Long afterward Daniel Webster, referring to Hamilton, exclaimed:

He touched the dead corpse of public credit and it sprang to its feet; he smote the rock of national resources and abundant streams of revenue burst forth.

Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson represented diametrically opposite views upon fundamental ideas of politics and government, but they set us a worthy example of setting aside for the moment, in a great national crisis, their own personal political antagonisms in order to consummate a great public benefaction. Of course, it has been said that the two Congressmen from Virginia were somewhat influenced by the location of the Capital here on the Potomac, but I would be the last to suggest that anyone here in this House in this good day could be influenced by concessions to his particular section or industry.

Here, too, we find a noble example in the action of these two patriotic Virginians who knew that the planters and farmers of Virginia would ask why they saddled upon their backs the burden of helping to pay the debts of Connecticut and of Rhode Island when Virginia had the debts she contracted practically all paid. Jefferson himself had to defend himself on this same score. He astutely blamed most of the fault on Colonel Hamilton, who might have misled him. A politician must not be blamed too much for seeking a good alibi.

And we have followed the illustrious example of the noble men of our pioneer age. Never, since I came to this House, have I observed finer cooperation between the two political parties and their leaders than is displayed in these efforts to restore our country to a better day.

There is a fine spirit of fairness and a tendency toward teamwork among the people of both parties, too. We must not expect too much of those who are purely political promoters of party triumph, particularly on the eve of a great political contest such as that of 1932 is destined to be. Some, no doubt, in both parties have not failed to sound a warning note lest the esprit de corps of political activity be lulled to sleep, but the great mass of the people are not so much interested in party welfare as they are in the welfare of their country.

A fine example of fairness and liberality is so finely expressed by one of my constituents in an editorial that I ask your indulgence while I read it into the RECORD. The author is former Gov. George H. Hodges, of Olathe. Olathe is one of those fine old towns with a rich pioneer history, situated, as it is, at the juncture of the old Oregon and Santa Fe Trails, the two most historic and romantic trails that ever mapped the frontiers of the earth. Olathe was the home of John P. St. John, who made Kansas dry.

Governor Hodges made the Democratic Party in Kansas dry. Both were man-sized jobs, but their work stuck. Governor Hodges was the Democratic Governor of Kansas from 1913 to 1915. He was, like St. John, one of the greatest governors Kansas ever had. Everyone who knows him honors him for his intellectual and moral integrity. He preaches honesty even in politics and he practices what he preaches. In an editorial appearing in the Johnson County Democrat of March 10, 1932, under the interrogatory, "Why blame the President?" He says:

The official scolders of the National Democratic Party in the East The omcial scolders of the National Democratic Party in the East have lathered themselves into a white heat notwithstanding this bitter winter weather. They iterate and reiterate the tremendous waste of the Hoover administration and the glaring deficiency of more than a billion and a half dollars in 1931. This rough stuff sent out through various papers and magazines is not in accord with the genuine facts that the public should be aware of, if they do not already know the facts.

The tremendous deficit of a billion and a half dollars should not be charged to Mr. Hoover and the Republican Party alone, for had it not been for the Democrats voting with the Republicans, both in the Senate and in the House, there probably would not have been this tremendous deficit. Read the recorded vote on appropriations and you will find that had the Democrats not voted with the Republicans the deficit would have probably been the normal deficit that all administrations incur.

Go back to the administration of Fresident Coolidge. Notwith-standing that almost every State in the Union bonded itself to soldiers, a tremendous majority of the Democrats in Congress voted with the Republicans and passed the soldiers' bonus bill over Coolidge's veto.

When the soldiers' bonus loan bill was up in Congres 1931 the leading Democrats in both the Senate and the House threw all their force into the fight along with some of the Republicans and voted for the bill which has taken out of the United licans and voted for the bill which has taken out of the United States Treasury practically a billion dollars in the last year. President Hoover vetoed that bill. The original bill provided that the soldiers should receive a certain percentage yearly as compensation and these payments were to become due each year for 20 years. President Hoover vetoed the bonus loan bill and it was passed over his head with the usual majority. Do not charge that much of the deficit up to Mr. Hoover, for whether the bill was right or wrong, the Democratic voters in Congress made it possible.

The fact is that a majority of these Congressmen and Senators can't stand on their own feet politically, and as an election is coming on they overrode Hoover's veto for the purpose of ingratiating themselves in the favor of the World War veterans, for all of them expect to run for the Senate and the House again.

of them expect to run for the Senate and the House again.

The United States is going through difficulties and disaster that older countries have already gone through since the World War. The Democrats, Progressives, and Socialists are a part of this country, and if both in the Senate and the House they had not voted with the Republicans this deficit would not have been piled high on the taxpayers' shoulders at this time.

The public debt to-day is practically $16,000,000,000 plus almost $2,000,000,000 deficit in 1931, and 30 per cent of that debt was for World War compensations and pensions. The Government, for the service of men and women in the World War, has already paid them $5,722,202,959.46. In the one year of 1930 the United States spent $511,718,778 for the benefit of the veterans of the World War, and we wish to emphasize that Democrats voted for these bills and we wish to emphasize that Democrats voted for these bins and helped to make this deficit, so why charge it up to the Republicans alone when we Democrats as a party made it possible ourselves?

There were 2,400,000 United States soldiers in France and 1,000,000 of them never saw a battle. The Government had in training 5,000,000 soldiers. Half stayed in the United States and half went over, and the compensation of those who stayed in the United States is the same compensation that the veterans re-United States is the same compensation that the veterans re-ceived who had seen service in France.

The Government owes it, and can not do too much for the war veteran whose health and efficiency were impaired in the service, whether in camp or on the battle front.

All members of civilian organizations of men and women whose services contributed to the winning of the World War are deserving of the same consideration and should have had compensation if for any reason their health was permanently impaired.

It might be well at this time to remind our Democratic Party managers that our Congressmen and Senators voted for practically all the expenditures that they now complain about, as

Drought relief	$45,000,000
Public roads in 1930	125, 000, 000
Farm Board	500, 000, 000
Soldiers' loan bill (about)	1,000,000,000
Farm relief, Mississippi River flood, crop failures, new post offices, etc., 1930	700, 000, 000
Post office deficit is daily	100,000
To these add millions wasted in river improvement	nts.

The total Government expense in 1931 was $5,178,000,000, and practically 65 per cent of the Democratic Senators and Congress-men voted for these bills. Why charge them all to Hoover when the Democrats furnished the balance of the votes to put them

Let us not forget, also, that when the Farm Board bill was up the Democrats were very strong for it, and didn't their votes contribute to a half billion dollar bet on an economic venture doomed to failure in advance?

This eminently fair and perfectly true statement demonstrates that the deficit is not the child of any one political party. Both parties fathered it and now to be square, both parties must join to support their joint progeny. It comes from my good Democratic friend, one of the outstanding political and business leaders of Kansas, and in this spirit of fairness and patriotic cooperation I come as a Republican joining the Democratic Speaker, that incomparable statesman and patriot, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and the gentleman from my native State of Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in supporting this temporary measure in the belief that its passage will balance the Budget and justify our faith in the greatness of our people and our country.

As Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton, three of the greatest men who ever lived in one age, joined their might to establish the credit of the United States let us, following their example, unite to preserve it unimpaired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism of the able members of the Ways and Means Committee, who have worked so hard to prepare this tax bill to balance the Budget. No doubt this bill does not entirely meet with their approval but is reported as a nonpartisan compromise measure. I know the gifted statesman, our distinguished Speaker, our able and seasoned floor leader, and most of the great Democratic members of this committee have always been, and are at heart now, opposed to this manufacturers' salestax provision.

They disdain to call this illegitimate sales tax a Democratic measure. Certainly no Republican will ever attempt to place it on our doorstep simply because a few Democrats lent first aid to extricate us from the financial debacle brought about by Republican rule.

If some of those leaders in the discharge of their duty, by compromise or otherwise, feel they should assume the responsibility of balancing the Budget by supporting this sales tax, then, in my opinion, that is a matter between them and their constituency, since they accord us the same privilege.

Mr. Chairman, the manufacturers' sales-tax provision of this bill is contrary to every principle of Jeffersonian democracy. It is a direct tax upon the necessities of life and, once enacted into law, will be continued. A sales tax was advocated in 1921 by Senator Smoot and Andrew Mellon, then the spokesmen of the Republican Party. Shortly before Congress convened this same Mr. Andrew Mellon declared for a sales tax, and since his resignation his assistant, Mr. Ogden Mills, who has been promoted to Secretary of the Treasury, has also strenuously insisted upon a sales tax. It has the approval of President Hoover and his satellites. Wall Street and the big moneyed interests of this country and the metropolitan newspapers, owned and controlled by them, are demanding the enactment of this law. A few Democrats who have forgotten the lifetime principles of democracy are contending it is not a sales tax.

The only difference between the two laws is that a sales tax is collected by the retail merchant, while a manufacturers' tax is paid by the manufacturer when the articles are sold, but in both instances the tax is passed on to the consumer. It is the same elephant, but of a different color; in addition to being branded with G. O. P., as it should be, we discover that it is a white elephant accompanied by a few Democrat acrobats. Instead of requiring those who are most able financially to carry the burden of government, it seeks to make the middle and poor classes pay upon the necessities of life. To say a part of this tax will be absorbed and paid by the manufacturer and not passed on to the consumer is stretching the truth to the limit. The consumer will not only have to pay all of the tax, but the retailer will add on some for his trouble, which will also be passed to the consumer.

A manufacturers' tax sounds better to the poor consumer than a retail sales tax. Regardless of the name, it is dangerous medicine, although it is claimed that it will be tasteless, and that the payment of the tax will be painless. It has for its object the centralization of wealth and power into the hands of a few and the wiping out of the middle class and leaving only the exceedingly rich and the poor. It may be a painless tax, like the tariff, not seen or observed, but in this the American people are not going to be deceived. The difference between this tax and the tariff is that the tax collected from the tariff goes into the hands of the manufacturers and to enrich those engaged in industry, while the money coming in from the sales or manufacturers' tax goes into the Federal Treasury, but in doing so it relieves the tax that should be levied upon those who have unjustly accumulated the wealth of this country.

We are now met with the argument that we must be patriotic, nonpartisan-the same old argument used to promote unjust measures. Since when did the Republicans of Congress and a few Democratic Congressmen obtain the right to stand for the patriotism of the membership of this Congress? Such an argument is unworthy of the merits, if any, that this bill contains. We are now told that we must balance the Budget, which means that we must make our revenue equal to our expenditures. Who started this policy and battle cry? It comes from the President, the Republican organization, Wall Street, and its vigilant friend, Ogden Mills, Secretary of the Treasury. the last three years the Budget has not been balanced: but now since the Democrats have control of this House by a scant majority of five, we must pass a tax on to the consuming public to take care of the deficit caused by the reckless and wild expenditures of the Republicans and this administration.

It is true that the American people demand that we shall not spend more than we collect; they are demanding that Congress shall not spend $4,000,000,000 a year, but this public is not demanding that a tax should be placed upon the laborer and the poor class during this panic and depression. What the American people are demanding is a reduction rather than increase in taxes during this panic, the abolishment of overlapping and useless bureaus, and the weeding out of at least 20 per cent of the number of employees. There is not another government in the world that has as many employees and public servants in proportion to the work they do as this country. These employees draw more salary, work shorter hours, and receive more benefit than those of any other nation in the world. After 30 years they are retired on a good pension, the Government contributing $25,000,000 a year to keep up this retirement fund. While I know many perform wonderful service and work overtime, and while I am a friend to labor and willing to advance the welfare of these employees, at the same time I know that there are overlapping bureaus, useless positions, and many inefficient employees. A great saving in this Budget can be made in readjustment, consolidation, and abolishment of many of these Government bureaus. It is an insult to the intelligence of the American citizenship and a tragedy to pay officials of the Farm Board salaries from $50,000 to $75,-000 a year, such as is being done under this administration. Under present conditions it is a hard task for this Democratic House, the Senate and every other branch of Government being controlled by Republicans. This information should be known to the executives and heads of these departments, but not being in control it is next to impossible at present for us to obtain the best information.

For 1931 there is a deficit of over $900,000,000, which is mostly due to the shortsightedness of the Republican administration by reducing the income tax in 1930. In 1932 we are told the deficit will be $2,100,000,000, but as a matter of fact it will be more unless we curb our expenditures. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, we are told the deficit will be $1,200,000,000 and that we should make it up by this measure and particularly that portion of this measure which carries a manufactures' tax of $600 .-000,000 upon the consuming public. No such deficit would exist had not the administration through its Secretary of the Treasury returned to the rich and big corporations over $3,000,000,000 from 1922 to 1930 in refunds, credits, and abatements for incomes and inheritance taxes already paid to the Government. I realize that the Budget should be balanced and that we should not spend more than we receive, but I am not in favor of collecting most of this deficit from 95 per cent of this Nation to the great benefit of the 5 per cent rich. If we are unable to save enough to pay all of our expenditures in 1933, why not pass some of it on by a bond issue to be redeemed when we have cut down expenses and when the income would justify it? At the request of President Hoover and against my protest this Congress gave a moratorium to Europe of $252,000,000. and passed it into the deficit to be taken care of by a bond issue. Congress has given a moratorium to the bankers, the railroads, insurance companies, and big corporations of this Nation of $500,000,000, with a possibility of $1.500 --000,000 more, and it has given the Federal land banks a moratorium of $125,000,000, all of these appropriations being placed in a bond issue. Why not a moratorium to the 8,000,000 unemployed who represent 40,000,000 and to the other great mass of American people?

We hear it said that if we put any more bonds on the market it will kill the credit of this Government. Such an argument comes in poor grace in view of what this Congress has done at the request of President Hoover for big business. Such an argument is not justified by the facts. When the $900,000,000 of bonds were offered the other day at 3½ per cent interest, to take care of the deficit of 1931, it was three times oversubscribed. The wealthy are eager to buy these bonds, as they are exempt from taxation. The only reason that Government bonds have been selling below par is due to this panic and the facts that bonds and stocks can be bought upon the market that will pay an income of 10 per cent and 15 per cent. If Government bonds are not good, then our currency is not good, and nothing else in this country is of value.

We are told if we do not accept this manufacturers' tax that another tax will be forced upon us to take its place. We welcome such procedure, even though it is meant as a threat. A substantial portion, if not all, of the income from the so-called manufacturers' tax can be obtained from other sources where it will be more equitable.

A tax of one-half of 1 per cent upon transfers of stocks and bonds will bring in almost $200,000,000. It should be at least 1 per cent, and bring in twice the amount. This would mean if I bought $1,000 of stocks upon the stock exchange I would be required to pay $5 Federal tax. If there are any in the world who ought to be required to help pay for the upkeep of the Government it is those engaged in the sale and transfer of stocks and bonds; their business is mostly legalized gambling. This panic is to a great extent due to the manipulation of the stock exchanges whereby the unsuspecting and uninformed people of the country have been skinned out of their eyeteeth by the sale of inflated and worthless stocks and bonds.

Twenty-five million dollars can be collected from cosmetics, and this luxury should be required to bear its burden of government.

A tax of $1 upon $1,000 of the capital stock of corporations of this Nation will bring in $100,000,000, and it will not be a burden nor an unjust or unreasonable fee.

I believe that everyone who makes an income-tax return should be required to pay something, at least $10 for a service charge, as it takes just as much time and costs the Government just as much money to examine one of these reports as it does where a tax is paid. Certainly this should apply to Government employees.

Most married men who earn $4,000 a year pay nothing to the Government. When you take out $2,500 exemption and $400 for each dependent, and the other expenses incident to the earning of this money, there is nothing left upon which to pay a tax.

It should be the policy of this Government to make those who are able bear the burdens of this Government, instead of levying a tax upon those who are making a bare living, many of them suffering for the necessities of life, and those who are unable to pay any tax. Forty million dollars can be realized from this item.

Fifty-eight million dollars can be collected by a one-sixth increase of the tax on chewing and smoking tobacco.

Radio advertising is one of the highest-priced and one of the greatest businesses in this country, and it is done by agencies controlled and regulated by the Government, and a tax of 5 per cent of the gross receipts for advertising would bring in from five to ten million dollars.

The deficit in the Post Office Department is not caused by first-class mail but through the handling of magazines, catalogues, and so forth, carrying expensive advertising. This portion of the mail should be made to save millions of the deficit.

Stop the unjust practice of the Treasury Department of granting refunds on paid income taxes. Collect the just portion of the billion dollars past due on delinquent taxes, and with these suggested incomes the Budget will be balanced for 1933 and no bonds need be sold.

The enactment of this nefarious and unjust sales tax will meet with condemnation at the hands of the American public. It may be forced through Congress; but if it gets through the House, it will receive less than one-third of the Democratic membership and be enacted by Republican votes. The Democratic Party has always been against such a law; its traditional policy has been to collect its big tax from incomes and large estates. It was denounced by the national Democratic platform in 1924, and it is contrary to every principle for which we stand. If we can not get other means of revenue and can not take care of this deficit by sale of short-term bonds, then I say we ought to cut salaries, starting in with the Congressmen and going all the way down from top to bottom. My opposition is not due to personal political fear, which some proponents say actuates the opposition, but I do fear for my party, even though its enactment would only be for the purpose of collecting revenue to take care of a Republican deficit. I never want to see the day when it can be said that I was a Member of the Congress that placed a tax upon the hat, suit, underwear, shoes, stockings, and possibly the mittens of the orphan newsboy.

I never want to meet a laborer who makes his living by the honest sweat of his brow, is a good citizen, loves his country, and strives to give the best to his wife and children and have him point his finger at me and say, "You have placed a tax upon these jumpers that I wear and upon all the clothing of myself and family, upon the furniture and everything that is in our home, including the absolute necessities of life."

I never want a farmer to say, "You have placed a wartime tax upon us in time of peace," although he may know it was to cover a Republican deficit. What will he say and how will be act when he realizes farm implements are not exempt from this tax? In 1916 he could buy three plow points for a dollar, which to-day cost him 75 cents each. Practically all farm implements and machinery are manufactured and the price fixed by a monopoly, the greatest parasite ever known, which demands and collects twice the price of 1916. The financial panic has not reduced the price, and now an additional tax is sought against this same farmer, who is despondent and desperate, facing bankruptcy, and unable to sell his products for the cost of production.

A tariff tax upon the coffins in which we bury our dead and upon the swaddling clothes of a newborn babe has always been repulsive to me, and now I am asked to vote for a measure that is as bad, if not worse, than the tariff. The Democrats of the House have denounced the Hawley-Smoot tariff, and truthfully proclaimed that it was the cause of much of this depression and the loss of our foreign trade. This bill contains an infamous tax of 2½ per cent in addition to the tariff upon imports into this country, notwithstanding the fact that in retaliation foreign countries have boycotted our commerce and enacted retaliatory tariff walls against American products, which has caused hundreds of American industries to move into Canada and into other foreign nations.

A modification of the manufacturers' tax by elimination of a few of the necessities of life is not going to satisfy the American public. In my opinion, with the small majority that we have in the House and with the Senate and the President opposed to us, we are not going to be able to pass any measure at this session consolidating and abolishing the overlapping bureaus. If we are unsuccessful after an honest effort and there is still a deficit, then the American people will elect men to administer the affairs of the Federal Government who are in favor of economy and really balancing the Federal Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Allgood]. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, we have been debating for several days the most important and far-reaching tax feature that has ever come before the American Congress, and I feel highly honored to have been given the place by our opposition forces to close debate on this bill. I believe that the United States of America, considering the age of the Nation, is one of the worst tax-ridden nations of the world. I make that as an opening statement.

I believe the people of the United States feel that way about it. They tell us that this is an emergency measure. Congress told the people of the United States that same story after the Civil War, when they passed the first tariff measure. They said it was an emergency measure to raise revenue to pay for the war. And yet we see to-day that the tariff tax is still with us. It is not only a measure for revenue in this Nation but it becomes a measure to give to monopolies and trusts the advantage so that there may grow up in this Nation certain classes who control and own the greater share of the wealth of the country. This condition is the outgrowth of the tariff tax.

When the extra session of Congress was called for farm relief in 1929, we saw enacted by a Republican Congress the highest tariff ever enacted by any session of Congress. We saw, then, that the other countries of the world resented the passage of that tariff law, with the result that our foreign trade has fallen off from 1929 to 1931, $2,759,900,000.

We realize that we still have a high Budget, a great expense of government, and not sufficient revenues to meet it.

I am in favor of balancing the Budget. There is only one just way to balance our Budget. That way is not by raising taxes but by reducing expenditures. Do you know what will happen if we raise this additional billion dollars? It will result in Congress coming along and spending a billion dollars additional in appropriations. That will be the result of it. The logical and sensible thing to do is to cut the appropriation bills to the bone and cut down the expenses of this Government.

There is not a single appropriation bill that comes up here but everyone knows is rotten to the core and that we can cut it down. If they were expense bills of individual corporations, or if you and I were responsible for the paying of these measures individually, we would reduce them, and you know that we would do it. I can name endless appropriations that have been made by this Congress since I have been here that ought not to have been made. Take the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds. Take the building of this memorial bridge across the Potomac at the enormous cost of $15,000,000, with six bridges already across this river here in Washington. Take the $23,000,000 for the highway up to Washington's tomb. This makes $47,000,000 on these two appropriations alone, which were absolutely not needed. Some one has figured out that this road will cost the taxpayers of this Nation $1,000 an inch for the construction of it. Such wasteful and extravagant appropriations are responsible for the deficit in the Treasury and are responsible for Congress standing in such a discredited position before the people of the Nation. Yet here we are wanting to raise additional taxes. I say, reduce appropriations. The funded debt of this Nation and of the towns and cities and State governments is approximately $150,000,000,000, and the interest and retiring fund on this is about $13,000,000,000 each year. The direct tax that the people of this Nation paid last year was about $12,000,000,000. This total of $13,-000,000,000 of interest added to the $12,000,000,000 of taxes makes an annual debt of $25,000,000,000 that the people of this Nation have to pay. Let us do a little arithmetic. Divide this among 120,000,000 people, the population of the United States, and what does it amount to? It means that for every man, woman, and child in the United States there is a tax burden of $200 each year; and yet the gross income of the cotton farmers in the South was only $200 per family in 1931.

I saw this Congress in 1926 reduce the income taxes. I voted against it. I see other Members here who voted against it. There was great prosperity from 1926 to 1929. The speculators, traders, and manipulators made millions and millions of dollars. If these income taxes had not been reduced during these prosperous years we would not now have a $2,000,000,000 deficit.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLGOOD. I gladly yield to the chairman of the Veterans' Committee of the House, who is leading the fight against this tax measure.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman says that the income of the average cotton farmer is $200 a year.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Two hundred dollars last year.
Mr. RANKIN. The sales tax in this bill will impose an average burden of $25 a family, and that would be a great deal higher tax in proportion to their income than we are levying on these large estimates or on large incomes if we adopt the suggestion made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] a while ago.

Mr. ALLGOOD. My good friend has brought out a splendid point, and I will speak in regard to inheritance taxes. This nation collects $48,000,000 in inheritance taxes. England collects $400,000,000 inheritance taxes annually. We have 120,000,000 people and England has 70,000,000 people. Our national wealth in the United States is four times the national wealth of England, and yet we collect from these great estates only $48,000,000. If our rates on inheritance taxes were as high as that of England these millionaire estates would pay into our Treasury $700,000,000 instead of $48,000,000 annually.

Mr. RANKIN. I ought to have called attention also to the fact that these farmers have to pay their ad valorem taxes and their school taxes and all other expenses out of that meager income.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Absolutely; and I regret to say that in my State hundreds upon hundreds of people are having their property sold because they can not pay these exorbitant taxes.

Mr. RANKIN. After paying these taxes they have no net income left at all

Mr. ALLGOOD. That is a fact; and yet, with our people already burdened and with millions of people in this country who have practically no net income, this Congress proposes to tax them further with these indirect taxes that will be passed on to them so that they will have to pay them.

We were talking about the cotton farmer. I hold in my hand a product of the cotton farmer. It is a handkerchief that cost 10 cents. It takes 20 of them to weigh 1 pound. One pound of cotton made into 10-cent handkerchiefs sells to the public for $2. For that pound of cotton the farmer gets 5 cents. The consumer pays $2 for it. That shows the disparity between what the producer of the raw product receives and what the consumer must pay when he buys it.

Mr. RANKIN. That being the case, this sales tax on these handkerchiefs would be more than the farmer gets for the raw material.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Yes; and here we are, with the farmer already mortgaged, placing this additional burden on him. Forty-five per cent of the farms in my State are mortgaged, and they can not meet their mortgages. There are more farms and homes of people living in the small cities being sold for taxes than ever before, and yet Congress comes along and proposes to tax these people with a sales tax, which is entirely unjust and uncalled for.

Mr. Chairman, when in the world is Congress going to stop increasing taxes? Twenty-five years ago the people of this Nation were shocked out of their senses that a Congress in that day cost them a billion dollars, but to-day this Congress is costing our people $4,000,000,000 per year. I tell you, gentlemen, in the name of justice and common decency, this thing must stop or else our beloved Nation and Government will be ruined on the rocks of bankruptcy and dissolution. It is my purpose to serve notice now on this House and President Hoover that I will never support this tax bill.

Years ago I was a tax official in my county. Numbers of times I have seen the farmers of that county pay over to the tax collector their last dollar. Later I was permitted to serve as a State official in my State, and I was shocked to see the waste and extravagance in State Government. Out of every dollar made in the United States to-day more than 20 cents of it has to go to pay taxes. Twenty years ago the Legislature of Alabama spent $5,000,000 of the peoples' taxes per year; to-day the legislature of the same State spends, or allows to be spent, over $15,000,000 annually. All governments should reduce expenses and taxes rather than increase them. While State government costs have risen in expenses three-fold in the last 20 years, our National Government has gone well over four-fold, or become four times as expensive. What is the cause? I tell you it is useless bureaus, useless commissions, wasteful and extravagant appropriations. I am opposed to a continuation of this system, and I will fight it so long as I am permitted to represent an Alabama district at this National Capitol. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Sandlin, having resumed the chair, Mr. Warren, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill for 1932, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS-REVENUE ACT OF 1932

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, day before yesterday a letter to my colleagues gave citations to speeches in 1921 and 1922 against the sales tax then before Congress. Yesterday I was stopped by a colleague on the way to the Capitol, who said he had gone to the Congressional Library and examined the Record of those dates—and, more remarkably, had read the speeches—with profit. I inserted remarks including extracts from speech of December 22, 1931, bearing directly on the sales tax and including data on the Canadian sales tax proposals then before Congress.

Yesterday I listened to a splendid talk by Representative Davis, of Tennessee, against the sales tax, delivered before a handful of Members, and before the close of the session, only 20 Members—equally divided politically—were on the floor. I have seen Senators orating to empty benches on different occasions, so believe speeches and physical strength can be saved by "remarks" that carry the same information.

The sales tax bills before Congress in 1921 and 1922 carried estimates of a billion dollars. The bill before us has a $600,000,000 sales-tax item; and, although reported unanimously by 25 members of the Ways and Means Committee, second to none in Congress in ability and power, I feel certain that the $600,000,000 sales-tax item, composing 60 per cent of revenues proposed to be raised, will be stricken from the bill, possibly by the House but, if not, by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the able presentation of a sales-tax argument by the distinguished Democratic leader to-day, a personal friend and colleague of many years' standing. I would be the last to seek to answer him or any other member of the committee.

I do venture to suggest that men of great wealth—and Mr. Hurley is, I understand, in the highest brackets—will one and all be relieved from income taxes when the sales tax is substituted for an income tax that is proposed by Mr. Kahn, Mr. Hearst, Mr. Bache, and scores of others whose names in many cases appear in these remarks with their efforts to substitute a sales tax for an income tax.

No criticism is found in that course, excepting full publicity should be given of notives that may properly lie with those who would be ready to shift the taxes onto the shoulders of the consumer by a consumption tax.

The arguments here offered against the bill may not be persuasive so as materially to affect the result, but the opinions of expert tax authorities quoted of organizations in Canada and this country opposed to a consumption tax are unanswerable and should help strike from the bill the $600,000,000 sales-tax item.

That is a result devoutly to be wished for by the vast multitude least able to pay, and I doubt if the President indorses this item, basing that opinion on his familiarity with taxation principles and strong common sense, not on any inside information so frequently voiced by others.

SALES TAX ISSUE THE SAME AS IN 1921

In 1921 the issue was the same. Then it seemed that the influence for the bill would be overwhelming, but we defeated it in the committee. Now, with slight hearings and less publicity, the committee unanimously reports a $600,-000,000 consumption tax in the revenue bill. Let me express appreciation for the valuable work of my colleague, Representative LaGuardia, whose opposition in general debate is forceful, convincing, and logical. Also, in answer to charges that Congress and Members generally have been silent on extravagance, let me say, when the flood control bill, in the Seventieth Congress, passed the Senate with two hours' debate, carrying an estimated billion and one-half dollars for a widespread reservoir system covering condemnation of many millions of acres for flooding purposes and extravagant plans, I was then a member of the House Flood Control Committee.

Representative LaGuardia was called to aid and for four days we exposed the Senate flood control bill acting on the advice of Chief of Engineers Jadwin and after conference with President Coolidge. On a vote that assured sustaining of a presidential veto, the President compelled a compromise measure finally agreed to at $318,000,000 and a saving of over a billion dollars in that one bill by action of the House and President.

Six hundred million dollars in revenue can be raised by suggestions that I will hereafter offer, I trust without presumption, for any revenue bill should be properly balanced and not drafted on the floor by amendments. That is a proper function of the committee; but in its surprising recommendation of a consumption tax, I fear a flood of protests from interests proposed to be taxed caused the committee to return to the iniquitous sales tax because no organization had yet appeared specifically against that tax. I submit substitute revenues can be found to balance the Budget, but if not easily available the Government is not going hay wire nor bankrupt because of that fact.

BALANCING OF BUDGET DESIRABLE BUT NOT IMPERATIVE

Short-term securities until the present world-wide slump is relieved will, if necessary, meet the situation, and I say this with full knowledge of its threatened effect. I am somewhat familiar with Treasury pronouncements, mistakes, and sales-tax recommendations in the past. They are not to be taken literally in every case, as they have been frequently disproved, but I am equally in favor of balancing of the Federal Budget. I suggest some measures that may have been considered but, if so, should be reconsidered in preference to a sales tax which taxes the necessities of every consumer in the land through increased prices.

Let the Budget be balanced, not by a sales tax but by some of the following proposals: A gift tax may well be started, not at 11/2 per cent but at 10 per cent, which would reach a large percentage of gifts and should reach to 30 per cent maximum on large estates. Even if a maximum that will graduate a return of at least 20 per cent would not be excessive. By raising the estate tax with smaller exemptions up to 40 per cent on large estates, if need be, and repealing the entire 80 per cent State credit to the States, a tax still less than that of England might be held to meet Budget requirements. By taxing cars and trucks, imported oil-now free entry-a larger tax on stock and bond transfers, on bank checks, and, if need be, on cigarettes and on innumerable items, though protested, will be more equitable and just than a "sales" tax or "consumption" tax or "spending" tax which in its blood-sucking-leech effect reduces the income of every consumer in the land by adding the tax indirectly to the price ordinarily collected from necessities he must buy for himself and family.

This subject, as stated, has been with Congress before and, without professing any expert knowledge of the tax, I submit extracts from several prized tributes that are not claimed to have been deserved although the speakers and writers believed so, apparently.

Senator La Follette in Senate debate, Record, page 7371, November 5, 1921:

Mr. President, the (1921) sales tax was practically defeated over in the House, largely under the leadership of a Member of Congress from Wisconsin, Representative FREAR.

Of course, I did not merit especial credit for a result in which all helped, but another word from 1921 is offered because of the great organization represented then and now against the tax. From Hon. Edward Keating (editor Labor, 2,000,000 circulation):

My Dear Mr. Frear: You are entitled to practically all the glory for defeat of the sales tax * * *.

And from an editorial in that paper of August 23, 1924:

More than any other man he was responsible for the defeat of the Mellon (sales) tax plan and for the adoption of a substitute which lightened the burdens of 3,000,000 taxpayers.

Similar words from President Howard, of the American Farm Bureau Federation; Secretary Charles A. Lyman, National Board of Farm Organizations; Akerson, of the Grange; [ and others, indicate the character of organizations then marshaled against the iniquitous consumption tax then before Congress, and that evidence then submitted was practically undisputed by any student of taxation.

Although time is limited, like opposition is reasonably certain to be aroused against the $600,000,000 sales tax contained in the pending bill. Not because of unfounded prejudice, but because every leading tax authority is opposed to the principle of taxing consumers on necessities they buy in order to relieve those best able to pay who are more strongly organized and hope to substitute a sales tax for income-tax rates.

WHERE REAL TAXES ARE PAID

Mr. Chairman, those who denounce the new tax bill because it makes a heavy dent in their income will not move to England or France or Germany to get tax relief. In the last-named countries they would pay the hated consumption tax that the Treasury is trying to unload onto the people for the second or third time, and in addition the Englishman pays several times as much for the privilege of living in the old mother country and far more than that in Germany.

From last night's Star I clipped a brief comparison which I have not checked with official records, but if approximately true, the American taxpayer will never get farther away from New York than the Statue of Liberty, excepting for a brief trip abroad to learn what a lucky fellow he is to live in the United States.

The article is so interesting and well worth studying when income-tax payers are wearing crêpe on both sleeves in these days of tax mourning that I insert it for your perusal. It reads as follows:

In the United States a married man with one dependent child and a net income of $2,000 pays no Federal income tax now and would not pay any under the provisions of the new revenue bill

A citizen of Germany, with the same income and dependents, pays a tax of $215; an Italian pays $218; a Frenchman, $104; and an Englishman $63.

More pronounced is the severity of European levies on the More pronounced is the severity of European levies on the middle and high income classes. For example, the German with a net income of $5,000 a year contributes $989 to his Government in income tax alone. The loyal subject of King Emanuel digs up $717; the Frenchman, $104; and an Englishman, $63.

The married American with one child and an income of $5,000 under present regulations pays $16.50 Federal income tax. If the new revenue bill is enacted as drawn he would pay $29.50. In 1924 an American of the same status paid $42.50.

The residents of 28 of the 48 States are now required to pay a State income tax in addition to the Federal levy. The State taxes, however, average considerably lower than the Federal. Consequently, a person with a $5,000 income, living in a State which imposes an income tax, probably wouldn't pay a total of $50. That would be only one-fourteenth of what an Englishman pays. Particularly heavy are British levies on high incomes. A married man with one child and an income of $10,000 in Great Britried man with one child and an income of $10,000 in Great Britried man with one child and an income of $10,000 in Great Britain pays $1,800.

In the United States he now pays $123. He paid $204 in 1924 and would pay $154 in 1933 under the new revenue bill.

The same man with an income of $100,000 pays $48,000 in Great Britain and $16,245 in this country. In 1924 he paid $22,000 and under the new bill he would pay about $26,000.

This measure grants an exemption of $1,000 to single men, $2,500 to married men, and $400 for each dependent. Great Britain's exemptions are $485 for a single man; $730 for a married man, $245 for the first dependent child, and $195 for each other child. child.

For Americans who "view with alarm" the projected boost in income taxes, Government financial experts cite the prospect of tax-rate reductions and increased exemptions such as have been made heretofore when the Treasury enjoyed a surplus.

NINETY-FIVE PER CENT OF FARMERS AND LABORERS DO NOT NOW PAY ANY FEDERAL TAX

It may be proper to say that while constant protests are received from agriculture, labor, and other individuals and organizations against existing Federal taxes which they believe they are called upon to pay, not 5 per cent of the farmers or laborers in the United States, due to a $3,500 income exemption, now pay income taxes to the Federal Government, and that is the largest source of direct taxation.

Existing law provides an exemption of $3,500 for a married couple, and the percentage of farmers and laborers receiving over that net amount of income is small. The pending bill lowers the exempt net income to $2,500 per couple. Estate taxes, largely reached in the higher brackets, gift taxes now proposed, and other existing Federal tax burdens, or those proposed, will not affect the average individual. Indirect taxes on a very limited proportion of goods imported, with small excise taxes on tobaccos and cigarettes, are paid by all: but heavy taxes borne by the average farmer and laborer living in cities come from local taxes for schools, streets, town, county, city, and State government, all of which directly or indirectly are paid by the residents of the State. Indirectly, when no property is owned by renters, the rental payment goes to cover taxes and other expenses of the owner.

A popular misconception exists as to where the Federal taxes are laid; and although the local resident pays far higher taxes in proportion to ability to pay than the average income-tax payer living in the cities, those taxes are local and the Government receives no return but, on the contrary, contributes toward highways and other State improvements that give employment and aid to labor within the State.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to express some additional views beyond what was stated in the Record of Friday, March 11, when on pages 5818 to 5836 I submitted unanswerable arguments offered by many of the ablest men and tax experts in the country against a sales tax when that same question was last before the House. In that statement (in Friday's REC-ORD, March 11) will be found opinions of men like Professor Seligman, of New York, known throughout the world as an international financial and tax expert; Arthur A. Ballantine, attorney, New York City, formerly solicitor of internal revenue, whose opinion you will find on page 5824, where he says:

I believe that this idea of a sales tax, a tax collected everyhere, falling on no one, is a will-o'-the-wisp which has floated over this field of taxation and which is in danger of luring business men who approach Congress in an effort to get really beneficial changes into futile action instead of constructive action.

I believe that this committee, by the very careful and exhaustive consideration which it has given to the advocates of this plan and as careful thought as to conclusions, has done much to dissipate this myth and to direct the efforts of businessmen into practical channels instead of down a pathway which leads to futility.

Another expert witness quoted was Charles A. Andrews, whose careful study of the subject on behalf of the national industrial conference board as a tax expert caused him to

We started in upon the assumption that we were going to work it something in the form of a sales tax. We invited various We started in upon the assumption that we were going to work out something in the form of a sales tax. We invited various well-informed people to come before us. We reached out and got printed matter and manuscripts; we made investigations; and slowly but steadily the committee was driven to the inevitable conclusion that it, representing a large body of business men, could not bring before this conference a recommendation for any form of sales tax, except as the same related to a few specific articles, suggestions as to which we have made and which have been referred to by Mr. Armitage.

We haven't the perve as good citizens of the country—which have been referred to by Mr. Armitage.

We haven't the nerve, as good citizens of the country—which we believe we are, and are trying to be—to say to a body of business men in this country, who are suggesting that business be relieved from a billion dollars of excess-profits tax, that we propose a tax which will cause the billion to be paid by the ultimate consumer. That is such a violent divergence from the principle of payment upon the basis of ability to pay that we can not ask this body of business men to get behind that sort of a tax.

Mr. H. C. McKenzie, New York tax expert for the American Farm Bureau Federation, said:

I want to take the opportunity to emphasize the farmer's objections to a general sales tax, which have been voiced by our president, Mr. Howard, and to call your attention to just two or three things briefly. * * * three things briefly.

Ninety per cent or 95 per cent of that tax will be paid out of the living wage, if the contention of the proponents of the sales tax is correct; and I want to say that the farmers who are rep-resented in the American Farm Bureau Federation will never in the world stand for that proposition.

Mr. George P. Hampton, managing director of the Farmers' National Council, quoted on page 5825 of the RECORD of March 11, says:

A retail sales tax and other sales taxes and all similar taxes on food, clothing, and shelter, called consumption taxes, must be paid chiefly by the workers on the farm, in factories, mines, and transportation, millions of whom are getting less than the mini-mum wage necessary to maintain a family on a decent American

Mr. Speaker, presidents of farm organizations and of labor organizations, both in this country and in Canada, are quoted at length in that speech. These men, I submit, have a better understanding than those who have given the subject slight study or who may vote for this bill because it is reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

WHAT SALES-TAX WITNESSES WERE HEARD?

Let me call your attention to one significant fact. The Ways and Means Committee heard about 350 witnesses on the entire tax bill, as found in 1,230 pages of hearings. Of all those witnesses and all those pages of testimony, only 15 pages apparently were given to the only two witnesses who testified before the committee on the sales tax. This is significant, because while 60 per cent of the entire amount to be raised in the $1,000,000,000 bill, or $600,000,000, is to be covered by the sales tax, only two witnesses, as stated, were called to testify on the sales tax: Doctor Adams of my home State of Wisconsin, a man of exceptional ability, whom I have known for many years; and Mr. Alvord, formerly a clerk of the Ways and Means Committee, and afterwards an employee of the Treasury.

If 60 per cent of the entire bill, amounting to $600,000.000. has been written into the bill with 15 pages of testimony before the committee by two witnesses out of 350 witnesses, it is well that we ascertain what those two witnesses have said in favor of any sales tax. On page 260 of the hearings I quote:

Mr. Doughton. I believe you stated that you encountered very little criticism or opposition toward the sales tax in your investigation in Canada. To what extent did you discuss this matter with the consumers of the articles on which the sales tax is Doctor Adams. I am very glad that you asked that question. I did not talk this question over with representatives of labor organizations or agricultural associations or, if there be any, of the consumer. I might have found a great deal of criticism there.

Mr. Doughton. That is where the criticism would naturally be. Doctor Adams. Yes; and that is a real defect in my inquiries. I did want to talk to them, but I did not have time.

Here is the principal witness on the sales tax who testified before the committee a few days ago, on page 260 of the hearings, that he did not talk to a single consumer who pays the tax during several days he was in Canada studying the tax. His study apparently was directed particularly to matters of administration and not to the merits or justification for the sales tax.

NO SALES TAX JUSTIFIED FOR ONLY TWO YEARS

Now listen to additional testimony by one of the ablest tax experts of the country, given a few days ago before the committee.

Doctor Anams. I have one definite conviction. Whether you should have a sales tax or not is a question for you gentlemen, largely a question of policy; but this, I think is a common-sense conclusion, that it is not worth your while to adopt a Canadian sales tax for a short period of time, because to put it over you ought to have an administrative machine so well built up and so large that you would not be justified in creating it for a temporary tax of two or three years. (P. 260, hearings.)

What did the committee do on page 250 of the committee bill? Here is the provision:

No sale or importation after June 30, 1934, shall be taxable under this bill.

In other words, that limitation was written into the bill with full expectation of continuing the tax in order to relieve the income tax, or else the committee disregarded the evidence of its only two witnesses who said Congress would not be justified to create a manufacturers' tax for a temporary tax of two or three years.

On page 262, Mr. CHINDBLOM, of the committee, said:

Mr. CHINDELOM. Do you know of any other country which has a system similar to that in Canada?

Doctor Adams. No, sir; I do not. You know Austria has a system by which they attempt to eliminate pyramiding by varying the rate, but that is not the Canadian tax.

Here is the best expert that could be called by the committee who gives his testimony on the Canadian tax which we are asked to indorse. After a brief visit of several days he found a tax not similar to that of any other country, which he refused to pass on as a matter of policy, and ought not be taken over as a temporary tax of two or three years.

The committee would find itself out of court in a legal proceeding on that testimony of its chief witness.

Now comes the second witness, the only one aside from Doctor Adams who testifies in detail regarding this tax, formerly an employee of the committee and afterwards of the Treasury Department. Why he was sent to Canada and who sent him for four days to become an expert on the Canadian sales tax does not appear from the record, nor does he volunteer any expert testimony. On page 264:

Mr. Aldrich. Mr. Alvord, have you any idea why the Canadians did not make a list of the articles which are taxed, rather than to set out a list of exemptions?

Mr. ALVORD. In reading the act I am inclined to say that a list of the articles taxed would not be so much larger than the list of articles exempt.

Mr. Aldrich. That is a general manufacturers' tax in name only.
Mr. Alvord. That is almost true; yet, sir, not quite, however.
From the point of view of drafting a general law it is much easier to specify exemptions than inclusions.

This is the second expert's opinion of the Canadian law which he studied four days. Again, on the same page, he Savs:

Mr. Alvord. I do not know whether Doctor Adams went into this or not, but I think he agrees with me—if you adopt a sales tax without having the elastic administrative machinery, I am afraid your sales tax would be practically inoperative.

Mr. TREADWAY. Do you mean by elasticity, the judgment of an official?

Mr. Alvord. The basic principle of the administration of the Canadian sales tax, as I understand it, is that there, either as a matter of law or as a matter of fact, the administrative decision is final.

Again he says, on page 265:

Mr. ALVORD. If you are to consider the list of exemptions that the Canadian sales tax has, it means that you practically have got to write a tariff act. I have been through the 1922 act and the 1930 act, and you gentlemen have been through many others, I imagine that the pressure would be just about the same.

Again this second witness, with four days' experience in Canada, says, on page 266, and remember he was formerly a clerk of the committee, afterward an employee of the Treasury Department, and no one knows who sent him to Canada, so far as the record disclosses:

Mr. ALVORD. I agree with Doctor Adams that as an emergency measure I think it would be subject to very serious consideration as to whether it would be worth while to interject the entire ma-chinery for a short period of time.

Yet this bill proposes against the expert testimony of Doctor Adams and Mr. Alvord that it shall remain in force for only two years. Is anyone seeking to mislead Congress, and who drew that two years' limitation and why?

Again, on page 266, Mr. Alvord says in response to a question by Mr. CRISP:

Mr. CRISP. With the knowledge you have and as an American citizen, do you favor the levying of a general sales tax?
Mr. Alvord. At the present time; no, sir.

Here seems to be the length, breadth, and scope of Mr. Alvord's opportunity to study the effect of the sales tax as shown on page 267:

Mr. ALVORD. We started in with the minister of finance, rather briefly. We then went to the commissioner of excises, who is a briefly. We then went to the commissioner of excises, who is a civil-service appointee and who has been in the service a long time, and he called in two of his assistants. They were the men who primarily had the job of administering the tax. We spent practically an entire day with them in going over their administration. I think those are the only persons we discussed the matter with in the administration. Then we spent the remaining three days of our visit up there discussing the matter with manufacturers, manufacturers' representatives, and with attorneys.

No inquiry among consumers. I will furnish that testimony on the 1921 law.

On such testimony the committee reported in favor of a $600,000,000 sales tax, to exist no longer than to June 30, 1934, and this last provision was opposed by both of the experts called for advice.

The evidence of witnesses who accompanied the Hearst $10,000 junket trip to Canada was inserted in the RECORD. Some of those witnesses were opposed to the sales tax, even on the statement of officials who alone were consulted. No consumers, apparently, had any voice at any time in the matter. The officials were discussing their duties, and naturally liked their jobs. I speak of this particularly, because in my speech of March 11 on pages 5822-5823 I discussed at length the Canadian sales tax and cited labor organizations and others at St. John, New Brunswick; Hamilton, Ontario; Toronto, Ottawa, and elsewhere, all vigorously opposed to the sales tax then in force.

A sales tax at 21/2 per cent rate, not pyramided, to produce $600,000,000 would amount to $24,000,000,000 in purchases, but all these sales are expected to bring a profit to manufacturers, jobbers, wholesalers, and retailers. To take an extreme case, if a hundred per cent is added to the sales price, or 950 per cent to the tax, as quoted from committee hearings on page 5820 of the RECORD of March 11 last (testimony of ex-Senator Hardwick), it would double $24,000,000,000 in purchases to $48,000,000,000.

This would not ordinarily occur, but it is reasonably certain that the 21/2 per cent with all these profits added would be increased to possibly 10 or 20 per cent before the ultimate consumer paid the bill, and that would be four to eight times the rate fixed by the committee, and would mean an added tax four to eight times the $600,000,000 tax collected. Possibly $2,000,000,000 and more additional would be paid by the ultimate consumer to bring to the Government $600,000,000 in tax receipts as estimated by the committee. That tax has been reported to the House on the testimony of two witnesses, both of whom urged against enactment of any sales tax for the short period of two years.

Let me now quote from a speech made in the House February 21, 1922, when the bonus bill was up for consideration, and the Washington Times, one of the Hearst papers that now daily prints cartoons and arguments for the sales tax, declared of a letter I had written:

A bonus bill will pass the House, but if an open discussion is had it will contain a consumption tax.

That letter of 10 years ago was misquoted:

February 17, the Washington Times contained a single 2-line extract from that letter, quoting me as follows:

"A bonus bill will pass the House, but if an open discussion is had it will contain a consumption tax."

The letter squarely states if open discussion is had the bill will "not" contain a consumption tax, and with that exception the brief paragraph taken from a fairly long letter is correct, but I could have wished more of the letter had been quoted and that the two lines extracted had been rightly stated. Without other means of placing sales-tax facts before those interested, this is the only avenue of information available. Herewith I append the letter in full. It was written before the letter from the President had been received or made public, and I quote it because it discusses the merits of the proposed sales tax:

Washington, D. C., February 16, 9922.

Dear Colleague: The proposal to finance the soldiers' bill with a consumption tax means to tax the living wage of labor when the average man is receiving less than $500 pre-war purchasing power per family, and it taxes the farmer, whose average annual earning is $219 pre-war purchasing power, on all that his family consumes. In Canada it is estimated it increases cost of living from $30 to $50 per family, due to pyramiding of prices.

Clothing, shoes, food, gasoline, machinery, everything not specifically exempted, is increased in price from two to ten times the amount of tax according to Canadian experience. Sugar, 10 cents per pound there last month, was 6 cents here, according to official reports, and articles exempted this year are included next year. Every man, woman, and child, whether working or out of employment, pays the increased price through this 'painless sales tax.' Rockefelier and thousands of multimillionaires pay the same tax, while a half billion dollar tax means $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 added prices to those who consume. The Washington Times says, 'Wall Street welcomes it,' and as $500,000,000 was recently expected the payoff of empted from excess profits, luxuries, and high surtaxes over the consumption, there is a reason.

American farming and labor organizations are unanimous against the tax, and they represent 85 per cent of the consumption tax that will be paid, according to witnesses. A leading Republican Member from New York said to me not 10 Republican Members from New York will be returned if we pass a general sales tax. A complete Waterloo occurred in Canada for the Conservatives, who repealed the excess-profits tax and enacted a general tives, who repealed the excess-profits tax and enacted a general sales tax and a high tariff law. High prices were the issue.

No general sales tax law was ever enacted in this country in time of peace. No appropriation was ever before hung up with a special-tax tin can tied to it. It is a gold-brick tax to the soldier, who would help pay his own bonus whether he has a job or not. Not one witness for a sales tax came before the committee to favor it, although many appeared against it. A sales tax is opposed by practically every disinterested tax expert and by labor and agriculture here and in Canada, where it has been tried and repudiated at the polls. In the Recorn of January 3, 1922, page 832, will ated at the polls. In the Record of January 3, 1922, page 832, will be found conclusive testimony of many witnesses in this country and in Canada discrediting a consumption tax. Who is it asks for it and who pays for special trains and propaganda that covers local papers. local papers in a hope eventually to substitute this tax for the income tax now paid?

The last bonus bill struck out a consumption tax in conference before it passed the House. Senators tell me the tax can not pass the Senate. A bonus bill will pass the House, but if an open discussion is had, it will not contain a consumption tax.

Very truly yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

Let me now call attention to a significant part of that speech in 1922 which ought not to be overlooked by any Member of Congress. When Canada woke up to the fact that a sales tax had been tagged on to the people, the latter took action. I called attention in the RECORD of February 21, 1922, to a complete turnover of the Canadian Parliament which occurred at the election December 6, 1921:

Prior to the election, the Parliament stood-Conservatives, 120: Liberals, 84; Progressives, 14. The election gave Conservatives 51, Liberals 117, Progressives 65; or an opposition vote of 177 to 51, compared with a prior Conservative majority in a vote of Conservatives 120 to 98.

Quoting further from my speech-

This tremendous overturning of the Canadian Parliament, according to my advices, was occasioned by a high protective tariff and a burdensome manufacturers' sales tax like that which is now being urged by committee members.

Let me continue as to politics, which is certainly as important as any wet and dry issue, because it is a burden upon the necessities of the people which they resented in Canada according to the following testimony:

CANADIAN POLITICS

From many letters of denunciation of the Canadian sales tax I quote the following as to the political issue with labor organizations.

In a letter dated Toronto, Canada, December 13, from Toronto

In a letter dated Toronto, Canada, December 13, from Toronto District Labor Council, it is stated:

"While organized wage earners have not given any official expression regarding the sales tax, the general discussions on the political situation during the last few weeks leave no doubt as to their opinion. This system of taxation was soundly condemned by every speaker in any way connected with the labor movement officially.

The foregoing is a square expression of labor in Canada on the subject of a sales tax and of its political significance when it was "condemned by every speaker in any way connected with the labor movement."

FARMERS MAKE POLITICAL ISSUE IN CANADA

From the United Farmers of Alberta the following statement is significant of the political issue last election, when practically all of western Canada was wrested from the Conserva-

President Wood has referred to me your letter of December 6 re sales tax. I may say that there is a very strong feeling against the sales tax, and that it was vigorously attacked by many of the speakers of the organized farmers during the recent Federal general election.

The inclosed pamphlet entitled "Sales Tax Hits the Poor Man" (issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture) is, I think, a summary of the arguments used against this tax during the campaign, while the Try Outs in Taxation also contains references to this matter. * * *

I was interested to note that the sales tax in the United States is advocated by big business and financial interests, which fear the heavy income, excess-profits, and estate taxes. Exactly the same groups of interests advocated the tax in Canada, and you will note from the pamphlet Sales Tax Hits the Poor Man the representatives of the agricultural interests in this country were not consulted in any way in connection with the matter.

Yours very truly,

UNITED FARMERS OF ALBERTA, W. N. SMITH, Educational Department.

The sales tax was "vigorously attacked" by many of the speakers of the organized farmers during the recent Canadian election. Results speak for themselves.

WHAT CANADA DID

Before the Ways and Means Committee Edward F. Grady, speaking for the Mays and Means Committee Edward F. Grady, speaking for the American Federation of Labor, said on February 3:

"The members of our organization over in Canada joined with the farmers in protest against the sales tax, and at the last election on December 6 we were enabled to defeat all of those men who voted for a sales tax (p. 140).

"You took off $450,000,000 from the corporations which made "You took off $450,000,000 from the corporations which made excess profits. * * * You reduced the surtaxes on incomes by the amount of $61,500,000. * * * In the last bill you repealed $60,000,000 in luxury taxes. * * * In the last bill you repealed "It is an extremely dangerous proposition, and I predict if you impose a sales tax the people of this country will do what the people of Canada did when they had an opportunity—defeat everyone who voted for it (p. 141)."

I am making no comment on this testimony taken before the committee excepting to disclose the political action taken by the committee excepting to disclose the political action taken by the people of Canada with reference to the Canadian manufacturers or sales tax.

Another witness before the Ways and Means Committee, H. C. McKenzie, tax expert for the American Farm Bureau Federation,

"Mr. Oldfield. Do you know personally that that (the Canadian sales tax) was an issue in the recent campaign in Canada?

"Mr. McKenzie. Yes; it was an issue in the campaign, and the same interests that are opposed to the sales taxes and consumption taxes in this country opposed them in Canada also. Labor and the farmers are opposed to it there and were fighting it there."

As stated by Mr. McKenzie, the sales tax was vigorously attacked in Canada by many of the speakers of the organized farmers during the recent canada laction. In order that it may not seem ing the recent general election. In order that it may not seem the opinion of labor in the letter on a sales tax was isolated, I again quote briefly from Canadian sources.

From a number of letters the following indicates what the consumer thinks of the Canadian tax:

St. John Trade and Labor Council, St. John, New Brunswick, December 12, 1921.

• • Yours of the 3d received, inquiring about the sales tax in force in Canada. • • Briefly, the way the tax works is that each time an article is turned over or sold this tax is collected, and in these days of manufacturers, jobbers, whole-salers, retailers, and other middlemen it is easily seen where the tax lands us by the time the article reaches the consumer, for each time the article is sold the tax is collected and, of course, added to the next selling price, and a small tax of 1 or 1½ per cent easily amounts up to possibly 10 per cent or more in some

A SEVERE TAX ON THE WAGE EARNER

HAMILTON DISTRICT TRADES AND LABOR COUNCIL,

Hamilton, Ontario, December 26, 1921.

Re sales tax in Canada and its effects upon the wage * * Re sales tax in Canada and its effects upon the wage earners, can only say that this tax falls with peculiar severity upon the wage earner. It is very much like a tariff, minus the protective benefits. It is passed on to the consumer in every instance. And as the working classes on a whole are the greatest consumers, they of necessity pay the greater share of the tax. This, however, is in strict accord with true capitalistic economics and administration. They are sternly opposed to all forms of direct taxation, which would mean that those who own approximately 85 per cent of the wealth of the country would pay their just share of the taxes. This, of course, would never do. Hence the sales tax. Trusting that this information is answering your query. ing your query, I am,

Yours fraternally,

[SEAL.] H. G. FOSTER, General Secretary. Again I quote from another letter:

TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL,

TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL,

Toronto, December 13, 1921.

This tax was imposed to supersede the surplus profits tax which was in operation during the later stages of the war.

While organized wage earners have not given any official expression regarding the sales tax, the general discussions on the political situation during the last few weeks leave no doubt as to their opinion. This system of taxation was soundly condemned the event speaker in any way conpected with the labor properties. by every speaker in any way connected with the labor movement, officially or otherwise.

My information leads me to believe that the tax is imposed on My information leads me to believe that the tax is imposed on the manufacturers' output, the increased cost being passed on to the dealers and eventually the consumers pay the tax in increased prices. Unlike the income tax and business tax, which recognize more or less the principle of "ability to pay," the sales tax applies to consumers in the purchase of commodities, and if the consumer can not pay the increased price by reason of the tax, he goes without the goods. This sales tax largely applies to the necessaries of life, hence you will readily understand why organized workers oppose such methods of taxation when surplus profits are untouched. I am further of the opinion that the great majority of our people are unaware of what this sales tax really means, they pay the increased price without knowledge of the amount, no mention being made concerning the tax, to put the whole matter shortly-legally flimflammed.

Yours truly,

TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL, JAMES WATT, Secretary.

"Legal flimflamming" is a name with which to entitle the proposed sales tax here. If its passage results in a political turn-over like that experienced by Canada a few weeks ago, it will evidence a well-grounded, universal prejudice against flimflam

LEGAL FLIMFLAMMING

One other brief statement I quote from a communication dated Ottawa, December 2, that is more of a résumé of the tax than is covered by other correspondence. It says:

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, December 2. Ottawa this week received, entertained, and introduced to the Ottawa this week received, entertained, and introduced to the intricacies of its sales tax act a party comprising 47 Members of Congress, representing 30 different States, railway men, newspaper men, and others. They came as the guest of Mr. William Randolph Hearst, with Hon. Lester D. Volk, of New York, as head.

* * But while the members of the party studied the sales tax act from a variety of angles, your correspondent ventures the assertion that they did not receive nor consider facts with reference to its application to the consumer.

I do not helieve that in their examination of Government stages.

I do not believe that in their examination of Government statistics they found that a man with a wife and one child in Canada pays $18.66 every year as a result of this form of taxation; that a man with a wife and two children pays $24.88; that families of varying sizes pay on the following basis:

Man, wife, and three children	$31.10
Man, wife, and four children	37.32
Man, wife, and five children	43.54
Man, wife, and six children	49.78
Man, wife, and seven children	55.98
Man, wife, and eight children	62. 20

In other words, the sales tax in Canada adds to the living expenses of a family of ten $5 a month. Families of this size may be "unfashionable," but those who are not particularly stylish feel it to the extent as it applies, as illustrated above. Bachelors are

These figures are based upon official statements. Sales-tax collections for the 12 months ended October last amounted to $52,-870,000, while our population is approximately 8,500,000. This means a per capita tax of $6.22 for every man, woman, and child in Canada yearly.

The following table strikingly illustrates what income and sales tax combined mean to a Canadian as compared with a citizen of the United States:

Canada
Income—man, wife, and two children	$2,500.00
Income tax Sales tax	4. 00 24. 88
Total	28. 88
United States
Income—man, wife, and two children	2,500.00
Income tax	8.00
Total	8.00

The sales tax in Canada is, above all else, a tax on consumers. The sales tax in Canada is, above all else, a tax on consumers. The more you buy the more you pay. It is paid in the majority of cases not on one able to pay but in proportion as one must buy things. With a person of means it is entirely optional whether he buys expensive furniture, limousine, etc., but in buying articles of ordinary consumption the average person has no choice. We must buy to live, to exist, and as we buy we pay.

The sales tax increases the cost of living. There can be no doubt about it. In Canada it is not a tax on luxuries; it is a tax on everything; and we must have necessities before we have

CANADIAN TAX AND THE FARMER

In this country it can be safely said that organized labor and organized agricultural societies are overwhelmingly opposed to a sales tax, as I have shown by reputable witnesses. In Canada the organizations are not so closely formed, but from the foregoing it may well be deduced that labor in Canada is against a sales tax. It could not be otherwise. Agricultural interests in Canada are not for a sales tax.

The Winnipeg Grain Growers' Guide put it that a sales tax "is immensely pleasing to those who had to pay the excess-profits and income tax and who care little where the burden of taxation falls as long as it doesn't fall on them."

It says:

"The people want justice in taxation before convenience, and there is precious little justice in this proposed tax on sales."

Admitting that the sales tax is finding great favor with financial interests across the border, it adds:

"To those who are not unacquainted with the ways of financial interests, the mere fact that the proposition emanates from their councils is enough to provoke suspicion, and when it is affirmed that the tax is 'passed along in small fractions and is finally paid by the consumer, practically without his knowledge, and the additions are so trifling as not materially to affect prices,' that such a tax would raise more revenue than the country actually needs, and that its adoption would lead to repeal of the excess-profits tax and the income tax, one begins to detect the 'nigger in the woodpile.' It takes a wizard of finance to maintain that some $500,000,000 a year can be painlessly extracted from the people of Canada."

In the RECORDS of January 3 and January 27 I furnished many statements from agricultural organizations of Canada. These will not be repeated, but I add a statement issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture that every Representative in Congress may well read, because it gives the farmer's viewpoint of the manufacturers' sales tax, which he declares collects 53 per cent of all the tax from farmers of Canada, because of their large purchases of things consumed and of things used, from shoes, sugar, and shirts, to gasoline and machinery.

The statement follows:

"CANADIAN SALES TAX

"SALES TAX HITS THE POOR MAN-AN EXAMINATION OF THE PRINCIPAL FEATURES OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S BUDGET FOR 1921-22

"(Issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture)

"The sales tax was the principal feature of the Federal budget for the fiscal year 1921-22, which was presented by the Minister of Finance, Sir Henry Drayton, before Parliament in May. By means of this tax the Federal Government expects to raise the additional revenue which is required to meet the increased expenditures of the present year, as compared with the revenue and expenditures of last year. It involves additional costs of living to every man, woman, and child in Canada, and treats them all alike, whether woman, and child in Canada, and treats them all alike, whether they be rich or poor, able to pay or not able to pay.

"Therefore, the sales tax, which was first introduced in Canada during May, 1920, is one that merits close study. This is especially true because it is intended to fall upon the great mass of the people, being levied, in so far as Canada is concerned, on a large number of the necessaries of life. It is thus primarily a consumption tay which is emother good reason why it should be thereuvely. number of the necessaries of life. It is that a final principal tion tax, which is another good reason why it should be thoroughly studied, for it is levied not in proportion to one's ability to pay studied, for it is levied not in proportion. As first introduced, it was studied, for it is levied not in proportion to one's ability to pay but in proportion as one consumes. As first introduced, it was a tax of 1 per cent on sales by the manufacturer or producer to the wholesaler or jobber, who in turn collected from the retailer. On sales made direct by the manufacturers or producer to the retailer the rate was 2 per cent. In 1921 the rate was increased to 1½ per cent on sales by the manufacturer or producer to the wholesaler or jobber; when the sale is made direct to the retailer the rate is 3 per cent. Another tax of 1 per cent is also collected on imports, the rate on such sales to the consumer being not less than 4 per cent. than 4 per cent.

"Taxes approximating to the sales tax were collected in Europe as far back as the Middle Ages, but coming down to the history of the last half century the sales tax made its appearance in of the last hair century the sales tax made its appearance in Mexico nearly 40 years ago, during the régime of Dictator Porfirio Diaz. The finances of Mexico were then in a chaotic state; taxation, being very little understood, was only slightly discussed, and, as the Mexicans had to buy and sell, Diaz came to the conclusion that by taxing these absolutely necessary operations he could raise revenue, and he did.

The sales tax was next copied by the United States administra-The sales tax was next copied by the Sharker States administra-tion in the Philippine Islands. After the Spanish-American War, through which these islands passed to the United States, their business life was in a state of collapse; the Spanish market, on which they had depended largely, having been closed to them. Being desirous of bringing about free trade with the United States, Being desirous of bringing about free trade with the United States, the sales tax was introduced as a means of securing a substitute for the revenue that had chiefly come through customs levied on American imports. France in 1920 adopted the turnover tax, which in principle is similar to the sales tax, though more equitable in that in France it included services and transactions of all kinds, as well as commodities. Germany also has such a tax, which is very far-reaching in its effect.

"WHO ASKED FOR IT?

"Whatever may be said in favor of the sales tax, there is no whatever may be said in layor of the sales tax, there is no doubt about it being an attempt to secure new revenue from the great mass of the people who work for a living. There is no pretension that it lightens the load of taxation resting on the masses; on the contrary, it is usually accompanied by measures designed to relieve the well-to-do of taxes borne by them. Canada's experience has demonstrated this in the most striking manner. manner.

"By whom has this tax been advocated? By the farmers, by "By whom has this tax been advocated? By the farmers, by labor, or by the great mass of those of small means? Influential financial, industrial, and commercial interests started the agitation. In March there was held at Toronto a conference on taxation attended by representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Credit Men's Association, the Retail Merchants' Association, and the Canadian Wholesale Grocers' Association. Neither the organized farmers nor labor were invited, though both would have sent representatives had their presence been desired. Note the recommendations made to the minister of finance by this gathering: 'That the business profits tax shall not be reenacted; that the income tax as regards corporations shall be repealed; that the present existing tax on confectionery shall be abolished; that the present existing tax on confectionery shall be abolished; that the present sales tax shall be adjusted so as to provide the additional revenue needed by the Dominion Government.'

"It is true that in 1920, when the sales tax was first introduced, no taxes were abolished or reduced. But in 1921, when the tax was increased, it was made to do the bidding of the interests represented at the Toronto gathering, and no others. Everything asked, save the repeal of the income tax affecting corporations, was granted, and the nature of the sales tax was thus revealed in its true light. No attempt was made to secure from the best-off portions of the community any part of the revenue thus lost. The masses were expected to make up what the big business interests were relieved of Sixty two millions. were relieved of. Sixty-two millions of new revenue were required, and in the heavier sales tax was the only means provided for the raising of the money, which meant a per capita tax of $7 for the

"SOME ABSURD CLAIMS

"Who are the advocates of the sales tax in the United States? For the most part they are representatives of the big interests, the agents of great capitalists and war profiteers, who, though they did not dare to complain of taxation while the war waged, have maintained a loud clamor against it since peace was proclaimed. These interests have conducted a vigorous propaganda in favor of the interests have conducted a vigorous propaganda in favor of the sales tax, many of the arguments thus advanced having been reproduced in Canada. Never before had as many absurd claims and extravagant statements been made on behalf of any system of taxation as have been made by the American advocates of the sales tax. They have told the public that a 1 per cent tax would produce so much revenue that no income taxes below $5,000 and possibly $10,000 would be required; that all surtaxes on incomes might be abolished, and that practically all the special war taxes might be allowed to go. So absurd are their statements that they call in question the whole case for the sales tax, so that the general public may well regard it with suspicion. They have been prepublic may well regard it with suspicion. They have been pre-pared to promise anything in order to get the opportunity to shift the load from their own shoulders. If the Canadian council of agriculture had lived on this side of the border, no better, clearer, or more significant statement could have been written regarding the absurd and misleading promises of United States sales tax proponents. They desire to substitute a sales tax for the present income tax in this country, as set forth by witnesses in my remarks contained in the Record of January 3. Canada spoke her judgment at the recent elections.

"REVENUE RECEIPTS DISAPPOINTING"

Again, I quote from the Canadian agricultural report:

"The sales tax can never be regarded as one of the main sources of revenue in Canada, since to make it so could only be done through a violent disregard of the best recognized principles of through a violent disregard of the best recognized principles of taxation, namely, that taxes should be levied in proportion to the individual's ability to pay them. As a source of revenue the 1 per cent tax in Canada was far from being a great success. During the 11 months up to the end of April, 1921, that it was in operation it brought in only $40,898,383. As a producer of revenue it failed most when money was most needed. In October, 1920, when business was good and retail prices still high, the collections were $5,020,476, but in April they fell to $2,873,219, and were still falling when the tax was increased. As Parliament voted $620,000,000 this year, one can easily see how far a 1 per cent tax would go to produce that amount. During the six months that the luxury taxes were in operation they brought in $2,000,000 more than the sales tax did during the whole eleven.

"Advocates of the sales tax make much of the fact that it is "Advocates of the sales tax make much of the fact that it is easily collected, and they confidently assert that nobody feels it. A tax collected on the necessaries of life that all must have can not fail to bring in a certain amount of money. But the question of the equitable nature of the tax must also be considered. Armies of occupation, through compulsion, sometimes succeed in raising large sums of money from comparatively poor countries; but to say that it can be collected is not sufficient justification for a tax. The sales tax is inequitable if for no other reason than that the poor man, who must spend practically all he earns, pays the tax out of what should go for necessaries, whereas the rich man pays it out of his surplus. The rich man, who spends several months in the year out of the country, escapes the tax; but the man who can not afford to go away, pays.

" LET THE CONSUMER BEWARE

"The claim that the consumer did not feel the payment of the The claim that the consumer did not feel the payment of the 1 per cent tax is open to question. It is absurd to say that an already heavy-taxed public does not feel the taking of another $40,000,000 from it, especially when the greater part of it is taken from the poorest paid. Surely, no one will contend that the new tax, which on domestic sales is at least 3 per cent by the time it reaches the consumer * * and the tax on imported commodities, which is 4 per cent in such case * * is not felt. It is difficult to determine definitely how much the cost to the consumer is increased by the sales tax, but the probability is that the 1921 rate will increase costs generally about 5 per cent. On certain imported goods, on which the tax will never be less than 4 per cent, the cost may be increased as much as 8 per cent. 4 per cent, the cost may be increased as much as 8 per cent. This is especially true of commodities such as rubber tires, into the manufacture of which many imported materials enter. The effect of the tax in increasing the cost of lumber became so apparent that a reduction was made to the effect that the tax on sale of domestic material should not exceed 2 per cent; on sales of imported lumber the rate was fixed at 3 per cent. Even at these rates the tax is considerable to the settler who must build a house and outbuildings. It is, moreover, to be observed that the additional 1 per cent on imports will have the effect of raising the home price on all such articles as are taxable. Experience with the tariff leads one to expect this. "The consumer is bound to feel the effects of the 1921 tax more than that of the preceding year for the further reason that the list of tax-free commodities has been much reduced. The following, which were exempt in 1920, are now taxed: Salted, smoked, and canned meats, soups, tea, coffee, condensed coffee, milk foods and similar milk products, sage, tapioca, macaroni, vermicelli, split peas, pea meal, rice, rice flour, cornstarch, potato starch and flour, canned and desiccated fruits and vegetables, maple, corn, and can sirup, and imitations thereof. No argument is required to show that the taxing of these articles is a very considerable additional levy on consumers. It is worthy of special note that tea and coffee, being imported articles, bear a tax of at least 4 per cent. This is taxing the poor man's breakfast table, which most Governments are now loath to do.

is taxing the poor man's breakfast table, which most Governments are now loath to do.

"In the case of many persons enjoying but a small salary, or income, the sales tax practically cuts away the exemptions from the income tax. On an income of but $2,000 a year a married man pays no income tax; but calculating the per capita sales tax at $7, then if he has a family of four, he will pay $28. The head of a family of four—that is, a wife and two children—having a salary of $2,500 pays but $4 in income tax, but his sales tax will now take from him seven times that. And the examples to this effect could be multiplied.

" AN INSIDIOUS TAX

"AN INSIDIOUS TAX

"One of the most dangerous features of the sales tax is its insidious character. So-called 'painless' extraction methods of taxation are always to be feared, for, in a quiet way, they touch the average person most effectually. Definite knowledge of what taxes the individual pays is one of the surest safeguards against inequitable taxation. By the 'painless' sales tax it is proposed to take this year $23,000,000 more from the consumers of Canada than was taken last year. What is the use of making a fight over the tariff if the money which it is hoped may thereby be saved is to be taken away by another method?

"Additional danger lurks in the possibility that having brought about its introduction, certain interests that have been benefited may further use it to shift other burdens from their shoulders. It is well known that they are restive under the tax on higher

It is well known that they are restive under the tax on higher incomes, and also under the surtaxes, and it may be taken for granted that an attempt will be made to shift these onto the backs of the masses. The signs are not wanting that some of the most important political battles of the not distant future will be fought important political battles of the not distant future will be fought over the question of taxation.

"There should be an insistence that taxes conform to the well-known canons of taxation laid down by Adam Smith in the following: 'The subjects of every State ought to contribute toward the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue that they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State. The expense of government to the individuals of a great nation is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their respective interests in the estate. In the observance or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality, or inequality, of taxation.' According to this standard the sales tax is weighed in the balance and found wanting.

and found wanting.

"Winnipeg, August, 1921."

In view of the foregoing statement founded on actual Canadian experience, will any man say the tax does not unjustly hit the poor man, and will anyone say it is not and was not a political issue that helped overthrow the conservative Canadian Parliament and reduce it to a hopeless minority?

Remember that the purchasing power of the farmers' products in Canada, as in this country, makes a difference of more than double the prices here quoted to the farmers' disadvantage.

Acting undoubtedly with the aid of advice, the President wrote Chairman Fordney regarding the soldiers' bonus bill. Suggestions from that high source are welcomed by every member of the party who has a legislative responsibility, however, humble. In fact, I who has a legislative responsibility, however humble. In fact, I yield to no man in my appreciation of and high respect for the Executive; for the many difficulties he has met and surmounted as the party leader following an unprecedented industrial and economic war chaos and his world position rising far above rulers of all nations through the recent peace accomplishments of the Washington conference. I do not need to say more, and I speak from the standpoint of a lifelong Republican.

The House has its constitutional duty to perform of providing revenues, and in its legislative work the added responsibility of securing agreement with the Senate. Following suggestions from the Secretary of the Treasury, the House Members sought to provide special taxes with which to finance the bonus bill, although in so doing a precedent would have been inaugurated that necessarily brings criticisms and protests against any tax and against any measure that requires a direct tax. It is not only an unprecedented method of legislation but manifestly unjust to the measure to be financed.

The proposal invited committee disagreements and the Presi-

The proposal invited committee disagreements and the President's letter containing suggestions followed. It suggested temporary delay if desirable in order to meet Treasury conditions, and to permit full cash payments to all service men and a general sales tax as a method of securing quick funds. Representatives of national ex-soldiers' organizations called before our committee referred to repeated promises for early action, objected to delay in the passage of the bill, and urged its speedy enactment as pre-pared with the five options. Asked specifically about full cash pared with the five options. Asked specifically about full cash payments, they said that would prevent the acceptance of certificates or of insurance or home-building options in the bill that had been carefully prepared and long and seriously considered with a view to granting permanent aid in the majority of cases. If offered all cash in amounts of $500 or $600 as is construed from the letter instead of continuing payments, the temptation would be offered all men to take cash and ignore other provisions.

The sentiment of agriculture and labor in this country on the subject of a sales tax based on recent expressions is as follows:

subject of a sales tax based on recent expressions is as follows:

STATEMENT OF SAMUEL GOMPERS, FEBRUARY 16, 1922

"Organized labor stands 100 per cent for the soldiers' bonus but is opposed to a sales tax as a means of raising revenue for the bonus, just as it is opposed to a sales tax to pay any debt contracted by the Government.

"The attempt to attach the worthy proposal for the bonus to a most vicious measure inimical to the rights and interests of our citizenship is a flagrant manner of incurring the people's resentment to a just cause.

"Labor recognizes in the proposal to attach the sales tax to the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill a subterfuge intended either to defeat the bonus or to create a feeling of resentment against the veterans of the World War by placing the burden upon those least able to bear it, and by permitting the escape of those who profiteered so relentlessly during the period of the war and

"The bonus should have the approval of Congress, but to create a sales tax would be to turn a measure of justice into an imposition and an injustice upon the whole people.

"The position of labor upon the sales tax is stated officially in the following resolution:

"'Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled declares against the imposition of a retail or general sales tax or turnover tax, or any other tax on consumption, and opposes the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and demands that the highest rate of taxation levied during the war upon incomes and excess profits be retained until the full money cost of the war has been paid.'

"Congress refused to adopt the sales tax as a part of the general revenue provisions. That proposal should not now be used to becloud the merits of a measure intended to do justice to those who patriotically defended the country in its hour of need."

Many other recent statements from labor have been quoted in previous remarks, but I will only repeat extracts from one that is concise and indicates the way a sales tax is regarded by American consumers generally:

DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: The attention of all members is Dear Sirs and Brothers: The attention of all members is called to the proposed sales tax bill introduced by Congressman Volk, of New York. It is the intention to raise $2,000,000,000 a year by a sales tax upon everything you consume. In order to have this bill put over and become a law, they have tied it up as a part of the bill for a bonus for soldiers. We think all workingmen agree that the soldiers who fought for their country are entitled to a bonus, and that such a bill should be passed, but, in our opinion, it is not necessary, in order to pay this bonus, that the working people of the United States should be taxed through a direct sales tax bill to the amount of $2,000,000,000.

The sales tax bill can be killed most easily by the enactment of a rapidly progressive tax upon estates, by restoring the excess-profits tax, by retaining heavy taxation of large incomes, by levying a small tax on the value of land in excess of $10,000, with an exemption to all farmers who receive less than $3,000 income per year, as provided in the Keller bill. Senator La Follette has introduced such an estate tax bill (S. 2901), and it has been referred to the Senate Committee on Finance.

Hoping you will give this your prompt consideration, we remain, Yours fraternally,

President Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. AMERICAN FARMERS

The American Farm Bureau as late as February 17 of this week—yesterday—issued a letter to Members of Congress on a sales tax, which I am advised was passed upon by President Howard and other responsible officers. It is as follows:

American Farm Bureau Federation, Washington, D. C., February 17, 1922.

To Members of Congress.

Dear Sirs: The American Farm Bureau Federation is against the sales or manufacturers' tax for raising the soldier bonus as suggested by the President. We feel it is just as uneconomic to place sales of manufacturers' tax for raising the soldier bonus as suggested by the President. We feel it is just as uneconomic to place a sales tax upon the people for the purpose of giving a bonus to the soldiers as it is for raising revenue for general Government expenses. The sales tax is levied upon food, clothing, and the necessities of life of the average man and does not take the money from those who are most able to pay.

Taxes are already exceedingly high and a sales tax would only mean further burden upon the average individual, and when we stop to consider that the average income of each man, woman, and child in this country whose income is below the income-tax level is only $333 per year, the American Farm Bureau Federation believes it would be a rank injustice to raise further revenue for the soldier bonus by this method. It would take away from these people any prospect of accumulating a competence no matter how small, and would blight their hope of bettering conditions. Not only would it cut off their opportunity for saving but in countless instances it would mean less food, fewer shoes and stockings, less coal for the stoves, and more crowded living quarters. It must be remembered that the bulk of the revenue, if secured by a sales tax, will be derived from the taxes on food, fuel, clothing, and shelter.

We feel that the passage of the sales tax would cause many farmers so to shape their farming operations as to be more nearly self-sustaining, and therefore still further reduce business operations of our country. The farmer now gets only 37 cents of the consumers' dollar, and a sales tax will reduce that amount. We are glad, however, that Congress has seen fit to discard the proposed sales tax once, and the federation sincerely hopes that it will do so again.

Very truly yours,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, GRAY SILVER, Washington Representative.

I can not make this any plainer than by quoting a short letter recently received from representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation. In these letters they assume to speak for an agricultural organization numbering between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 active members. They denounce all consumption taxes that in like manner are denounced by Canadian labor and agricultural interests, speaking from the standpoint of the consumer.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, Chicago, Ill., December 27, 1921.

Hon. James A. Frear,

House Office Building, Washington. D. C.:

Replying to your letter of December 23. The American Farm Bureau Federation is unalterably opposed to any general sales or turnover tax, a manufacturers' tax, or any means of shifting the bulk of the taxes from income to consumption taxes.

The more the matter is agitated and the better the people come to understand what is involved, the more determined they become in their opposition, and this policy, if persisted in, will surely bring calamity to its advocates.

It takes from the farmer, the laborer, and all those below the income-tax level a part of their living, and the bulk of the tax would necessarily come out of the necessaries of life—food, fuel, shelter, and clothing.

It is an effort to shift to the 90,000,000 people below the incometax level the burden of the war taxes; it would absorb a considerable part of what buying power they now have, and thus sink us still deeper in the slough from which we are trying to extricate ourselves

It would stir up such a social ferment as we have never had in this country and is both socially unjust and economically unsound.

It is opposed by all the argricultural interests of the country as well as by organized labor. Political madness lies that way.

Yours, truly,

H. C. McKenzie, Tax Representative.

The following letter from President Howard is equally positive

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, Chicago, Ill., December 28, 1921.

Hon. James A. FREAR,

Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives,

Washington, D. C.

. We believe that taxes should be DEAR MR. FREAR: * Dear Mr. Frear: * * * We believe that taxes should be levied according to the measure or ability of the individual to meet them and are particularly opposed to the so-called sales tax or turnover tax. Its enactment would place an undue burden upon the farmers of the country, due to the fact that their income both on labor and invested capital is, and always has been, below that of any other class of our people, while at the same time we are of necessity very large consumers not only of food and clothing but of steel and iron products, building materials, etc. The sales tax would add to the costs of all these things, which burden would be strenuously opposed by all farmers. Not only that, such a tax would react on industry by further curtailing the farmers' purchases, and industry is already suffering from that farmers' purchases, and industry is already suffering from that very cause.

Very truly yours,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, J. R. HOWARD, President.

Yesterday, February 16, The National Grange, composed of over 1,000,000 members, gave out the following statement:

GRANGE PROTESTS SALES TAX

"The National Grange, through its Washington representative, T. C. Atkeson, in letters sent to-day to Senator McCumber, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Representative Fordney, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, declared it is 'unalterably opposed to the sales tax or any form of direct consumption tax for the soldier bonus or for any other purposes.'

"'The sales tax is a deliberate effort to shift tax burdens from those best able to pay to those least able to pay,' the letters said. 'Once a sales tax is inaugurated, backed with the power which is now urging it, it is doubtful if it could ever be set aside, and we can look forward to steadily diminishing taxes on large incomes and inheritances and to steadily increasing sales taxes to pay the burden of government.'

"'The National Grange,' Mr. Atkeson continued, 'has suggested an average, profits tax to pay the soldier beauty.

burden of government."

"'The National Grange,' Mr. Atkeson continued, 'has suggested an excess-profits tax to pay the soldier bonus. Should that be inexpedient, the tax decided on should be so levied that it will not be levied to the direct cost of necessities of the great number of people of limited income."

The national farm meeting called by President Harding recently, in Washington, passed the following resolution against any sales tax. I quote from editorial that shows the protest against a sales fax.

[From editorial page of Farm and Home for March; Chicago, Ill., and Springfield, Mass.]

"THE SALES TAX—UPON THE NECESSARIES OF LIFE—THE POOR SHALL PAY THE TAX—THE RICH MAY LARGELY ESCAPE THIS TAX

"'We positively and earnestly protest against any consumption or sales or manufacturers' tax, or any other tax which shifts the burden onto those least able to pay, onto the necessaries of life, and has proved disappointing financially and unjust socially wherever tricd.' Unanimously adopted by national agricultural wherever tried.' Unanimously adopted by national agricultural conference at Washington, January 27, representing all phases of farmers' thought and farm activity.

"This tax is now urged on Congress—a tax on sales—within three weeks of the day that the farmers' conference at Washington unanimously protested against such a tax. The common people, the masses, unitedly oppose it.

"If this tax is imposed, it means that you will have to pay an extra tax of probably 3 cents on every dollar you spend. Of course, the retail prices that you pay will be correspondingly increased. Worse yet, the wholesale price that you get for your produce when sold will be correspondingly decreased.

"Thus you, the farmer, the producer, the worker—all persons of moderate means—may be forced to pay the equivalent of not 3 cents, but somewhere between 5 and 10 cents extra upon every dollar you spend, while having as much more deducted from every dollar's worth of stuff you produce and sell.

dollar's worth of stuff you produce and sell.

"WEALTH ESCAPES TAX

"Did you notice how theaters, financiers, and other special interests protested in unison against the righteous plan of taxing amusements, speculation, excess profits, and great wealth? Those powerful interests are so highly organized that they made their protest effective within 24 hours.

"The logical result is now the proposed sales tax. It will be but trifling upon those best able to pay, while a well-nigh insufferable burden upon everyone least able to stand additional taxes."

The National Board of Farm Organizations is equally opposed to the sales tax, and its secretary, Mr. Lyman, sends a letter which also contains cumulative testimony from the secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture against a sales tax. I quote:

NATIONAL BOARD OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS, Washington, D. C., January 24, 1922.

Congressman James A. Frear,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Frear: I have gotten in touch with Canadian people in regard to the sales tax, and I hope to have a definite reply soon.

In the January 14 issue of the Prairie Farmer, published in Chicago, a copy of a letter from N. P. Lambert, secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, appears as follows:

"Our organization throughout the whole country is strongly opposed to the sales tax. The principle of this tax is wrong in our opinion, being based on the consuming capacity of the great masses rather than their ability to pay. The sales tax was in vogue in the Middle Ages, in such countries as Spain, but to-day I believe the only countries that have used it to any extent are Mexico, Germany, Philippine Islands, and, I think, France. It is generally regarded as a confession on the part of any country that adopts it that all other sources of revenues have been exhausted." hausted.

This appears to throw an entirely different light on the matter as far as the Canadian farmers are concerned, and is also in line with my previous understanding of the real position taken by the farmers in that country.

Sincerely yours,

CHAS A. LYMAN, Secretary.

From recent committee hearings another farmers' organiza-tion representative is quoted:

[Hearing, January 20, 1922, p. 35. Benjamin Marsh, Farmers National Council]

"Mr. Marsh. Gentlemen, I wish some of you had taken the trips which I have and talked with these farmers and workers some workers who have been out of a job for six or eight months and every last dollar gone, and the farmers, who are broke, absolutely—and when you talk about a sales tax—I want to tell you that the sales tax is the dead line politically for any party, and deservedly so.

"Mr. Frear. Mr. Leffingwell agreed in his opposition to a sales tax and so did Doctor Seligman when they were before our com-

And from scores of witnesses named in Records of January 3 and January 27 I quote two men of acknowledged standing and fairness who recently appeared before our committee:

"Mr. Seligman. It is true, I assume, that the general principles governing democratic taxation in this country would continue and that no democratic country would intend to pass or for a moment consider a tax on consumption, because it is only in time of war that there is any need for the restriction of consumption, whereas in time of peace you want to increase consumption that you can increase production and industry and prosperity."

[Hearing, Jan. 19, 1922, p. 22. R. C. Leffingwell]

"Mr. LEFFINGWELL. The economic and social objection to a sales tax or to any indirect tax is that it hits the man who has to consume the things that his income will buy, because his income is so small and his family so big—out of all proportion to his income—so that the tax is much heavier on him than it is on the man who has a great big income and has to spend a very the man who has a great big income and has to spend a very negligible proportion to meet his tax.

"I believe that the sound principles of taxation are going to come to be recognized by all parties, because they go to the root of social content; and whether we are Republican or Democrats, and whatever our school of economics and whatever our historical thought about questions like the tariff, whatever our instincts about a sales tax, it is coming down to this, that you can not afford to put the inordinate burdens of the modern State upon the shoulders of the consumer, who has to spend all of his income to keep alive."

Not one witness favoring a sales tax appeared before the Ways and Means Committee. In fact, this tax seemed friendless until it was suddenly proposed as a means of financing the bonus bill. No chance to examine witnesses has been afforded the committee to expose the character of the tax.

SALES TAX VERSUS EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

A comparison of those opposed to a sales tax and advocating the reenactment of an excess-profits tax is not complete without presenting another picture that comes from the lips of a man whose wonderful power of analysis is rarely equaled in or out of Congress. I quote from a soldiers' journal, March, 1922, called Treat 'Em Square. It gives the ex-soldiers' viewpoint, and on page 29 contains the following from a public speech of a distinguished United States Senator:

"Why should not the year weelthy seek to account the Territory of the complete speech of the period of the complete speech of the complete

"Why should not the very wealthy seek to escape? Mr. President, they have been seeking to escape and have been making a great battle along that line.

"WEALTH ESCAPES BURDEN

"Along last winter I happened to be in the city of New York. A friend of mine extended me an invitation to go with him down to the Economic Club. As I always have been obliged to practice economy, I thought I would learn something that would enable me to continue the habit of my life; but when I reached this assemblage, a very costly banquet—I make no point of that, because my friend paid for the ticket—I think I can say that there were several billions of dollars represented around those tables, were several billions of dollars represented around those tables, and a speech was made in favor of a sales tax, and the leading speech was made by a broker who is said to be the largest broker in the world, and to have transactions in a single day which frequently equal $50,000,000. He is not at all a bad citizen. He is a good broker. That is the best and the worst you can say of him. "But, viewing the question from his standpoint, it was but natural that he should think in the terms of his clients' interests, and his clients were the great institutions engaged in floating vast blocks of stocks and of bonds; and as they filtered through his office, of course they paid some tribute on their way to the ultionice, or course they paid some tribute on their way to the ultimate consumer, the customer who buys these securities. When he told that multitude of a plan that would distribute the taxes everywhere so that everybody would have to pay, so that there would be no escape, and that the taxes would not be paid by the great institutions of the country but would be borne by the entire mass of the people, the champagne glasses were put upon the table and highballs sat unconsumed while the assembled enthusiasts cheered the sentiment to the echo.

"SHIFT BURDEN TO POOR

"SHIFT BURDEN TO POOR

"Of course, he said, the tax was passed on, like all taxes; therefore it might as well be paid by the common people at the beginning as at the end, in one way as in another; and then he told us in the next breath, as we have been told on this floor, that the burden upon business is so great that business can not prosper; that is to say, they tell you in one breath that business does not have to pay the tax at all, and in the next breath they tell you that it is so oppressive that business can not live if you exact it. Now, you can not have both ends of that argument. If the tax is passed on it hurts nobody; particularly it does not hurt the man who first pays it and passes it on. If the tax is not passed on, then the other argument fails and it becomes apparent that the common people of the land who have but little pay only a little, while those who have much must pay in proportion to their wealth.

while those who have much must pay in proportion to their wealth.

"That was the initial movement; it was, if you please, the kick-off in the great game that was proposed to be played which had for its purpose the removal of excess-profits taxes, surtaxes, and corporate taxes.

"Sensitors may be a sensitive may be a it will vote against it * * * will cast a vote in a way to save himself from a direct vote; but if he does it he will vote to kill the soldiers' bonus, and at the same time he will vote to take off the excess-profits taxes, and that would be worse than to vote directly on the proposition."

I have quoted from a soldier's magazine that in turn quotes from the official Congressional Record containing the debate in the Senate. Whatever we may think of the general sales tax or the excess-profits tax, is it not time to pause and reflect on the Canadian record and the political situation we are inviting in this country by adding a sales tax to the soldier's bonus bill?

THE ANTISALES TAX VOTE

This sales tax was rejected by Congress when the revenue bill was passed a few months ago and received slight consideration then because it has always been a disappointment in estimates and in equity. In France revenues per month fell to 43 per cent of estimates within less than a year, and fell in Canada to 57 per cent of estimates according to report. The tax is a tax on the living wage, and the poorest man who walks the streets out of work and the rich man find a common level for the first time financially in this consumption tax. Politically they also stand financially in this consumption tax. Politically they also stand on the level. I have quoted from farm organizations representon the level. I have quoted from farm organizations representing in membership between three and four million adults, which membership is against a sales tax, if the representatives speak for the membership. I have quoted from the highest officials of organized labor and of the railways representing a combined membership of several million adults, all of whom have reason to membership of several million adults, all of whom have reason to oppose a sales tax on the living wage. From seven to ten million adults and their families reaching one-half of the total vote conservatively may be estimated to be the combined farm and labor vote opposed to a sales tax or a tax on consumption, if that vote is cast as it was in Canada.

When wealth is anxious to shift its income tax over to the consumer, even as it has shifted $500,000,000 taxes this year, it is well to acceptable what interest open practions now jurging a sales.

well to ascertain what interest organizations now urging a sales tax have in the matter. These questions were discussed in the RECORD of January 3. If it be a fact that farming and labor inthe state of January 3. If the a fact that farming and labor interests have a combined adult population of 10,000,000 people or more at a modest estimate, their influence may be measured if they feel the consumption tax is now being aimed at them to relieve wealth from its fair share of taxation.

At a late moment I insert a letter written to every Member of the House by a number of Members that gives further reasons for opposing any sales-tax provision to the bonus bill.

THE SALES TAX IS FUNDAMENTALLY WRONG

The letter is as follows:

"Dear Colleague: We, the undersigned, who favor the soldiers' bonus bill, urge you not to consent to any manufacturers' or other sales tax as a means of raising revenues for meeting this obligation. We believe the economies effected by this Congress in the ordinary governmental expenses, together with the very substantial reductions to be made in the appropriations for the Army and Navy as a result of the disarmament conference, will Army and Navy as a result of the disarmament conference, will very nearly provide the money with which to meet the cash payments as contemplated under the provisions of H. R. 1. It is estimated that something more than $100,000,000 in addition to the above savings will be needed annually for the next two years to meet the bonus, after which the revenues will be ample to meet all demands.

"This $100,000,000 annually, or $200,000,000 if need be, can easily and readily be raised by the issuance of short-term certificates. You will recall that the Treasury Department a short time ago placed upon the market short-term certificates in the amount of $400,000,000, and the records disclose the subscriptions for this issue were approximately $1,200,000,000, or three times the amount of the issue. Neither during the time these certificates were being sold nor since has there been the slightest indication of an adverse effect upon the money market, but instead it is since then the country has witnessed the greatest strides toward the return of normalcy. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency indicates a constantly increasing improvement in our financial affairs. Consequently we believe there is undue alarm as to the possible effects of an issue of short-term certificates in order to meet the demands of the bonus.

"The President helieves the are-soldier should be paid the cash order to meet the demands of the bonus.

"The President believes the ex-soldier should be paid the cash bonus all at once and that it should not be spread over a number bonus all at once and that it should not be spread over a number of payments. This would require an expenditure of $1,500,000,000 within the next two years. He suggests a general sales tax as a means of raising this sum. Clearly, if this amount of money is to be raised by this means in one year or two, the tax must be applied to everything, including the actual necessities of life.

"Just how this tax works out in fact is best exemplified by the Canadian sales tax as applied to sugar. In Canada sugar is produced under almost exactly the same conditions as in the United.

duced under almost exactly the same conditions as in the United States. They produce beet sugar in large quantities, and cane sugar is imported from the Tropics and refined. The expense of sugar is imported from the Tropics and refined. The expense of these operations is on a standard with similar operations here. In January sugar was retailing at 10 cents per pound in Canada and 6 cents in the United States. The tax there is a semi  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent turnover. The manufacturer or importer is taxed  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent and the jobber  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent—in all, 3 per cent. Three per cent on 6 cents—the price of sugar where the sales tax does not apply—is  $1\frac{1}{16}$  mills; and if the amount of the tax only was collected from the consumer, the Canadian would be paying \$0.0618 per pound for his sugar instead of 10 cents. When the merchant sells 100 pounds of sugar and collects the tax thereon, he collects 18 cents for the Treasury and \$3.82 for himself, the jobber, and the whole-pounds of sugar and collects the tax thereon, he collects 18 cents for the Treasury and \$3.82 for himself, the jobber, and the wholesaler, or more than twenty-one times the amount of the tax. And yet certain people proclaim this a 'painless' tax.

"Ninety millions of our people, whose income is below the income-tax level, have an average annual income of less than $350. These 90,000,000 will pay 85 per cent of the revenue derived from a sales tax in addition to the billions which will go to the manufacturer incharge and retailers are a result of such tax. facturers, jobbers, and retailers as a result of such tax. Millions are out of employment, and the farmers of the country are in dire straits. To add to their burdens would be a calamity.

dire straits. To add to their burdens would be a calamity.

"Wall Street is openly in favor of a sales tax, according to an afternoon paper. It is known that back of the propaganda with which the country has been flooded during the past two years are the strong manufacturers' organizations. If this tax was to be absorbed by the members of these organizations, would they be advocating it? We think not. We believe they recognize fully that a sales tax is an ideal method of further increasing profits.

"We wish also to call your attention to the fact that if a sales tax is placed upon the statute books for the purpose of raising funds for the bonus, it is going to be but two years until the revenues raised in this manner can be no longer used for this purpose. The bonus will then have been paid. We believe that when this time comes it will be most difficult to repeal such a law, for the reason that every special and favored interest in the country will demand its retention, and also insist that the tax on wealth be further reduced. When this is accomplished the process of the shifting reduced. When this is accomplished the process of the shifting of the burden of taxation will be complete.

We believe the sales tax to be fundamentally wrong and that it will never be countenanced by the American people.

"If the Ways and Means Committee should report out a bill arrying this tax feature, and a special rule which in any way abrogates the right of any Member to offer amendments to the tax provision should be presented to the House, we earnestly ask that you vote against such a rule. If there is to be a tax provision in the bill, it is extremely important that there should be a full and free discussion as to what this provision shall do.

"Respectfully yours,
"Horace M. Towner, C. Frank Reavis, M. E. Rhodes, Floorace M. Towner, C. Frank Reavis, M. E. Rhodes, Florian Lampert, Oscar E. Keller, Edward E. Browne, John M. Nelson, A. P. Nelson, M. In view of the fact that this bill may be sequeezed through the House notwithstanding its peculiar character and later meet with the fate it deserves in the Senate, I am submitting further testimony for the use of the latter body in case the eminent authorities at the other end of the Capitol should desire any arguments beyond good judgment that would seem to reject any sales tax now or at any other time when it is recognized that it violates every principle of taxing those according to their ability to pay and is based upon the necessities of the taxpayer placing the poorest consumer in the proud position of an equal taxpayer with Rockefeller who lives on shredded wheat and the simplest food.

I now quote from a speech of January 31, 1921, found in the RECORD of that date, and if by chance a portion of the testimony I have given should be repeated it will be unintentional but may serve to further remind us of facts which may have been forgotten.

A portion of the discussion is given to a turnover sales tax, as well as the manufacturers' sale tax now before us, but the principle is the same, although the manufacturers with smaller pyramiding does not present all the difficulties and injustice of a turnover tax.

A WAR SALES TAX DURING PEACE

Propaganda for the passage of a consumption sales tax by Congress is vigorously being waged. The stakes are $800,000,000 now paid from corporation excess profits that would then be shifted to the backs of 100,000,000 people, who must consume in order to live. Should this tax be shifted?

Mr. Frear. I desire to express the embarrassment of trying to discuss a question that ordinarily would take an hour and a half or two hours in the time allotted to me, which must be apparent to every Member of the House. We have a peculiar legislative situation in the House, that men can get recognition to speak only on general supply bills except by unanimous consent. When the supply bill is under discussion, objection is often made that we can not speak at that time on matters that are of the most vital imnot speak at that time on matters that are of the most vital importance to the Government but must confine our remarks to the portance to the Government but must confine our remarks to the bill. Think of the absurdity of this position of an intelligent body of men acting here on behalf of their constituents and for the country under such circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the proposition that I desire to discuss is one which proposes to repeal the present tax involving $800,000,000 under the excess-profits tax, and imposing in lieu thereof a tax of $1,000,000,000 by what is known as a sales tax known as the turnover sales tax. Every man in this House should be informed on that subject before he votes, and there is no way under heaven on that subject before he votes, and there is no way under heaven in which you can learn the facts except by some one digging into them and ascertaining what laws are in effect in other countries, and whether those laws have been effective or not.

I will say this briefly, that there have been several men here before the Ways and Means Committee, intelligent men, very able men, advocating the enactment of a general turnover sales tax, which, as you know, is imposed in Germany and in the Philippine Islands and in Mexico, the only three countries that impose it effectually. There they tax the sugar and tea and everything that they eat and drink on every turnover that may be had. The ablest body of men that has met in this country to consider this subject, known as the National Industrial Tax Board, has brought in a report showing how entirely objectionable that system would be for this country. The United States Chamber of Commerce, through its tax board, acting intelligently and weighing all the arguments, has brought in practically a similar report, which I will incorporate in my remarks.

Mr. Madden. Will the gentleman tell how many turnovers there

Mr. FREAR. I will. There are practically 9 turnovers in the case of cotton goods and woolen goods, 8 turnovers in the case of leather goods, and 7 or 8 in the case of steel—that is, from the original ore up to the time of the finished article. What applies to these articles applies with equal force to almost everything we use. In other words, this proposed tax of 1 cent on each turnover has to be applied from 5, 6, and 7 to 9 times.

But that is not the worst. You will find that in many cases where the present tax on luxuries is imposed they have raised the price of the goods sometimes 400 per cent during the different

Mr. Chairman, our Government is facing an annual tax burden Mr. Chairman, our Government is tacing an annual tax ourden five times the size of its pre-war expenditures. During the recent war large receipts were had from excess-profits taxes on corporations and on personal income taxes due largely to the surtax. Congress now is facing a well-organized propaganda, based on assumed economic arguments, for the repeal of the excess-profits tax and for a reduction on income surtaxes. Another extensive, tax and for a reduction on income surfaxes. Another extensive, well-organized propaganda exists which demands the passage of a turnover consumption tax law with a sweeping tax on all necessaries of life, which bill is pressed for passage by Otto Kahn, Julius Bache, Myer Rothschild, and others who have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee urging a turnover sales tax. Practically no opposition arguments have been presented to the committee. mittee

Only limited study has been or can be given this vastly important subject by the average Representative in Congress, and I am not assuming to speak against a sales tax from the standpoint of a tax student or tax authority, but from the viewpoint of a lay-man and legislator whose responsibilities are equally due to the banker, broker, and bricklayer, the capitalist and cobbler, the financier and farmer, the manufacturer and machinist, the teacher and day laborer, all of whom to a greater or less degree will help pay the $5,000,000,000 annual tax hereafter to be collected.

I desire to place before you the views of recognized tax students and authorities and shall intrude my own observations only briefly and for the purpose of calling attention to matters that have seemed to me worthy of consideration; but first as to the problems before us.

Mr. Wilson of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. Frear. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. Wilson of Louisiana. Does the gentleman discuss also the final sales tax?

Mr. Frear I will say that the final sales tax has not been pressed upon the attention of the Ways and Means Committee, for the reason that it brings in such a small income comparatively. We have what is called a final sales tax, of course, with the luxury tax to-day, but it is only a small producer of revenue. We need to raise a billion dollars or thereabouts by taxation to meet not only the repeal of the excess-profits tax, if we repeal that tax, but also to lower the surtaxes on personal incomes. That has been urged strongly, and it is something that may really have to be brought about, because to-day those who are paying high surtaxes are investing in tax-exempt securities.

Mr. Wilson of Louisiana. If you raised the same amount of money by a final sales tax, would not the final sales tax be just as objectionable?

They pyramided each time there is a sale made, Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. Frear. Yes. They pyramided each time there is a sale made, and it reaches an enormous amount of money.

Mr. McClintic. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the question.

The Chairman. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. Frear. Of course, any Member can block the wheels in this House unless we pass a resolution to stop it. This is a most important proposition affecting the rivers and harbors bill. It deals with the raising of funds to provide for the rivers and harbors, to provide for the railroads to function, and to run every department of Government, a question which every one of us is interested in, and the gentleman ought to know that it is directly in point, and not subject to his point of order.

CONSUMPTION SALES TAX AND SOLDIERS' BONUS BILL

Mr. Chairman, constant assaults on the excess-profits tax law from all directions indicate it is a friendless waif, not popular with those whose profits it has heretofore divided for the support with those whose profits it has heretofore divided for the support of Government and it also seems probable, judging from opposition expressed against any new form of tax, that no substitute will meet with general approval. One tax is insistently urged upon Congress in case the excess-profits tax law is repealed. It is known as a consumption turnover sales tax and was vigorously pressed on the Ways and Means Committee last session in an effort to make it part of the revenue plan that was to provide for financing the soldiers' bonus bill, which bill finally passed the House.

At that time, after a short but sharp contest, a Republican At that time, after a short but sharp contest, a Republican caucus rejected a sales-tax plan which in effect proposed to compel ex-service men to contribute through such tax to their own use. The measure was rejected as stated and other means of raising revenues were then adopted. The head of the same consumption sales-tax plan has again been raised, and it is now financed by large interests that seek to escape their full share of taxation. Ex-service men and women and every other man and woman in the country are to be called upon to contribute to this sales tax, although no return is now offered them directly or indirectly.

WHAT IS A TURNOVER CONSUMPTION TAX?

It is a reminder of the small boy's description of a toothache, "an abomination in the eyes of the Lord that does no man good." However, a consumption turnover tax will do everybody—good and plenty. It is a tax levied on every pound of sugar, salt, and starch that goes into family use from the growing of the sugar beets to its purchase at the store, on every pound of flour and other food, on every pound of meat from the farm to the packer and back again, on every pound of tea or coal, on every garment from the hat down to shoes and stockings, or, like an old-time description of a tariff bill, it is a tax from the cradle old-time description of a tariff bill, it is a tax from the cradle to the coffin. Every sale of wood from the owner to the logger, to the milliman, to the cradle or coffin factory, to the wholesaler, to the retailer, and finally to the customer who pays the tax on every turnover with several times added for good measure, until the actual cost and actual tax join in a free-for-all price raising for the 105,000,000 consumers who will pay an equal share of the increase. The wealthiest and poorest will never the same tax actual cost and actual tax join in a free-for-all price raising for the 105,000,000 consumers who will pay an equal share of the increase. The wealthiest and poorest will pay the same tax, because a turnover sales tax plays no favorites from Vanderbilt to the humblest beggar when both must eat or starve.

During 1918, one person in this country paid on an annual income of over $5,000,000, two on between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, 11 on between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, 49 on between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000, and 179 others on incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000. Under a turnover tax these people would turn over the same amount of tax for the same food, drink, and wear, as the poorest in the land. Fraud in omitting to report sales, which will be general, would penalize only the consumer. Administration by the Government would become a hopeless task, judging from past experience, when every seller levies the tax with a generous margin on the goods sold whether the tax is reported or not. It is neither a just, equitable, nor enforceable tax, and I desire to present proof of these charges against the criminal at the bar—a turnover consumption tax.

Let me place before you the best thought of the country that unqualifiedly condemns and convicts a sales tax and present some facts which are not based on theories but comes from men whose judgment we may well respect.

judgment we may well respect.

First. I will give the conclusions of the leading economic-tax investigation that has taken place since the war. The body making this report is not composed of farmers, laboring men, or others who would unanimously condemn a sales tax if given opportunity to do so. The National Industrial Conference Board is composed of 25 affiliated industrial organizations representing cotton, woolen, metal, boot and shoe, pig iron, and others that have a capital invested of several billions of dollars, in the aggregate, and employ several million men. No organization can speak with more force from the standpoint of national industry or aided by better expert advice. Other high authorities will be found to sustain the industrial board's findings.

Second. The arguments and influences now urging a consumption turnover tax will be presented.

Third. Testimony of individual tax experts opposed to a sales tax will be offered, men whose judgment is of great value in solving the greatest tax problem that ever confronted this Government in time of peace.

REPORT OF TAX COMMITTEE, NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL BOARD

Mr. Chairman, I quote first from a report of the tax committee of the National Industrial Conference Board on the Federal tax problem, December, 1920. The report says:

"Various advocates of a general turnover tax estimate that a 1 per cent tax on all turnovers would produce from $1,500,000,000 to $5,000,000,000. If the tax is limited to 1 per cent on the turnover of goods, wares, and merchandise alone, the estimates go down as low as $750,000,000. down as low as $750,000,000. * * * It has been suggested that bankers, brokers, and commission men should be taxed not on their sales but on their commissions or gross profits."

If a 1 per cent turnover tax were imposed upon each step in the cotton, leather, and steel business, it would carry separate tax on each of the following turnovers, according to the report:

" Cotton

- 1. Raw cotton to gin.
- "2. Gin to spinner.
- "3. Spinner to mercerizer. 4. Mercerizer to dver.
- "5. Dyer to weaver
- "6. Weaver to finisher.
  "7. Finished cloth to wholesaler.
- Wholesaler to retailer.
- "9. Retailer to customer.
- " Leather
- "1. Farmer to cattle buyer.
- "2. Buyer to hide dealer.
  "3. Hides to tanner.
- "4. Tanner to leather merchant.
- "5. Leather merchant to shoe manufacturer.
- "6. Shoe manufacturer to jobber.
- Jobber to retailer.
- "8. Retailer to customer.

" Steel

Iron ore to smelter.

- Smelter to manufacturer of ingots.

  Manufacturer of ingots to manufacturer at rolling mill. " 3.
- Steel manufacturer to tool manufacturer.
- " 5. "5. Tool manufacturer to wholesaler.
  "6. Wholesaler to retailer.
  "7. Retailer to customer."

These steps may be enlarged and the 1 per cent tax on each tax may be doubled and quadrupled, as illustrations later quoted will disclose.

THE TURNOVER SALES TAX

[From report of tax committee of the National Industrial Conference Board]

"1. The advocates of such a tax claim that it will in nearly every instance be shifted. If so, the tax could not be defended upon the grounds of social justice, because it would then fall with a force unequal to their ability to pay upon those least able to bear the burden. It would, in fact, be 'a tax against the living wage.'

"2. It is claimed by the proponents of such a tax that not only will it generally be shifted but that the exact amount of the tax would be passed on to the consumer. What ground is there for the assertion that a turnover tax imposed on each of many transactions all the way to the raw material will not be loaded just as often as a specific tax of a fixed and known amount? If $1,500,-000,000 or $3,000,000,000 should be collected from a sales tax levied on each turnover, would not this amount be loaded heavily?

"3. From the business point of view the uncertainty as to whether the (sales) tax would be shifted is most serious. The committee can not accept as conclusive the assertion that this tax would be passed on or that in the cases in which it was not passed on the tax is so small that the effect would be slight. A 1 per cent tax on sales would in many cases be more than a tax of 30 cent tax on sales would in many cases be more than a tax of 30 per cent or even 50 per cent of net income. If any great proportion of the billion or more dollars which is to be raised by such a tax would have to be paid by business which could not pass it on, the result would be widespread ruin and disaster.

"4. Whether or not the tax could be shifted, it would tend to encourage changes in business practices which are not in accordance with the economic development of the country. Many classes of so-called middlemen who perform a service which is well worth what it costs would be driven out of business. Devices to get around the tax through the avoidance of technical sales would be multiplied. multiplied.

"5. In cases where it is not shifted in its entirety, a tax imposed upon all sales or upon the turnover of a business becomes to that extent a tax on gross income.

"The inequity of a tax turnover on gross income as between a business which turns its capital once in several years and another which turns its capital several times a year, provided the tax can not be shifted, is too great to be borne.

"6. The advantage which a business enterprise carrying on several consecutive processes in the manufacture or distribution of a commodity would have over other enterprises which were not so self-contained, due to the pyramiding effect of a sales tax at each turnover, is little realized until concrete cases are examined and compared, as has been done by the committee."

After illustrating seven turnover taxes from iron ore to the fin-ished steel tool the committee's conclusion is reached: "In cases in which the taxes could not be shifted a pyramided tax might often prove ruinous."

"7. No dependable calculations have been submitted by its proponents as to the amount of revenue which such a tax would produce. Estimates by different parties range from $5,000,000,000 down to $1,500,000,000 for a 1 per cent tax on all turnovers and down to $750,000,000 for a 1 per cent tax on the turnover of goods, down to $750,000,000 for a 1 per cent tax on the turnover of goods, wares, and merchandise alone. It is suggested that bankers and brokers should be taxed not on their sales but on their commissions or gross profits. If this is so, why should a wholesaler whose gross profit on each individual sale may not be larger than the banker's pay a tax on his entire sales? (Who suggested?)

"8. The administrative difficulties involved in a turnover sales tax are but little appreciated by those who have not had close practical experience with the administration of a tax national in its score. The administration of such a tax would raise serious its scope. The administration of such a tax would raise serious problems, and the number of taxpayers would be so greatly in-creased that it would probably be difficult to prevent wholesale evasions.

9. It would be economically unsound.

"10. While the committee has not allowed political expediency to influence its conclusions, political opposition to a sales tax must be given serious consideration."

The foregoing are brief extracts from findings of a committee of experts representing the greatest industrial organization in the country. It is notable that eight reasons are given why a sales tax would injure or destroy different manufacturing interests and two reasons are given as to its unsoundness economically and

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON TAXATION OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES

It would seem that no careful legislator will be deluded by the arguments of a handful of financially interested advocates of a turnover sales tax, and the objections already presented are unanswerable; but another organization, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, has aimed to give the same service to Congress on the same vitally important tax problem, and through its committee of nine tax authorities has also announced its findings on a turnover sales tax. The report of its committee against this tax is unanimous. I quote at some length because of the recognized high standing of this country-wide commercial organization:

"A CONSUMPTION TAX-DIFFICULTY OF ADMINISTRATION

"Various arguments have been brought forward in support of a sales tax, but in the opinion of the committee these arguments are overcome by important objections to any attempt to use such a source for Federal revenues. In the first place, the application of any of these taxes and its successful administration would not of any of these taxes and its successful administration would not be so simple as is often supposed. In declining markets and under conditions of close competition turnover taxes would frequently have to be borne by the seller, and in many instances might for him be an added cause of loss. Even if passed on through addition to the price paid by the buyer, it would almost inevitably be pyramided, causing material increases in many prices paid by consumers.

"RUINOUS EFFECT OF PRICE PYRAMIDING

"There are still more fundamental considerations weighing against such a tax. One of the objections to the excess-profits tax would apply with added force; this is uncertainty in yield of revenues, for gross sales fluctuate more widely than net income. If any form of turnover tax were imposed it would result in advantages for large industrial undertakings which begin their processes with raw materials and carry them through to the finished product; such integrated industries would be subject to the tax but once whereas their smaller competitors acquiring tax but once, whereas their smaller competitors, acquiring materials from independent sources, would have the tax in their prices several times and probably increased in effect through pyramiding. Finished articles imported from abroad would have a similar advantage over domestic manufactures.

"REPUDIATES PRINCIPLE OF TAXING ACCORDING TO ABILITY TO PAY

"Perhaps the greatest inequity, however, would appear in the proportionate results of any of the taxes here under consideration upon the person with small income as compared with the person of large income. At the bottom of the economic scale are person of large income. At the bottom of the economic scale are persons whose income barely suffices to provide them with necessities of the poorest quality and in the smallest amount, and at the other end of the scale are persons whose expenditures for necessities, no matter how large, represent but a fraction of their income. Any tax falling upon general expenditures is consequently disproportionately heavier for persons of smaller incomes as compared with persons of larger incomes. To the extent sales taxes of the sorts that have been suggested were used as a general source of revenue there would be a departure from the principal source of revenue there would be a departure from the principal source of revenue there would be a departure from the principal source of revenue there would be a departure from the principal source of revenue there would be a departure from the principal source of revenue there would be a departure from the principal source of revenue there would be a departure from the principal source of the eral source of revenue there would be a departure from the principle that taxes should be levied in accordance with ability to pay. " OF DOUBTFUL LEGALITY

"Finally there would seem to be legal difficulties in the way of a general sales tax. Opinions handed down by the Supreme Court in March and June of this year make it clear that such a tax is not authorized by the income-tax amendment to the Constitution. Whether or not it would be held by the courts to be an indirect tax is uncertain; if it were held to be a direct tax, it would, under the Constitution, have to be apportioned among the States in accordance with their population, an obviously impracticable procedure. Reliance for revenues in large amount should not in any event be placed upon a tax regarding the legality of which there is doubt."

MEN WHOSE REPORTS CARRY WEIGHT

The character of the National Industrial Board tax committee. that prepared a long, comprehensive report, may be ascertained from the following personnel:

"T. B. Stearns, Denver.
"R. G. Eiliott, Chicago.

"F. R. Fairchild, New Haven.

"J. I. Straus, New York City.

" E. W. Stix, St. Louis."

The importance of interests represented and ability of these men will not be questioned by anyone who examines their respective reports.

Mr. Chairman, it must be kept in mind that these business Mr. Chairman, it must be kept in mind that these business interests are acting for their own protection because of the uncertain character of a turnover consumption tax. When it does not shift, it threatens the industry compelled to pay it; and when it shifts to the consumer, he is unjustly compelled to pay a tax now paid out of corporations' excess profits.

The authorities quoted will carry weight to most minds of the absolute danger attending a turnover consumption tax.

EXPERTS WHO CAN BEST TESTIFY

Another list of authorities can be quoted whose names are They consist of the farmers, clerks, skilled and common labor, housewives, and others not enumerated, who are glad to earn enough to get food and clothes and to give their children a common-school education. They are the ones who will be called upon to pay 90 per cent and over of the proposed consumption taxes now paid by corporation excess profits and high supertaxes on personal incomes.

Any advocate of average intelligence can safely take his case to this class of experts and secure a verdict against a turnover consumption tax nine times out of ten, either in a judicial, legislative, or political forum, and the tax, if passed, will be tried out without doubt by the last-named court, and the one of last resort the people at the first opportunity given to register their disapproval at the polls.

WHOM DOES CONGRESS CONSULT IN REVENUE LEGISLATION?

Presumably no more reliable adviser for Congress on revenues exists than the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it is to properly and economically collect revenues and carry on the fiscal policy of the Government. He has for his advisers Government tax experts and men of nation-wide reputation without private or personal ends to protect or advance. He is concerned in both revenue to be obtained and method of administration. In his 1920 annual report Secretary Houston condemns a proposed sales tax, as follows (p. 28):

tax, as follows (p. 28):

"In the Treasurer's opinion there are many grave objections to a sales tax. Further consideration of the subject has convinced me that a general sales or turnover tax is altogether inexpedient. It would apply not only to the necessities of life—the food and clothing of the very poor—but it would similarly raise the prices of the materials and equipment used in agriculture and manufactures. It would confer in effect a substantial bounty upon large corporate combinations and place at corresponding disadvantage the smaller or disassociated industries which carry on separately the business operations that in many combinations and trusts are united under one ownership. The group of independent producers the business operations that in many combinations and trusts are united under one ownership. The group of independent producers would pay several taxes, the combinations would pay only one tax. Finally, it would add a heavy administrative load to the Bureau of Internal Revenue which * * * is already near the limit of its capacity. Simplification of the tax laws and restriction rather than extension of its scope are as important from the tax and the tax laws and tax laws an standpoint of successful administration as from that of the taxpayers' interests."

ADMINISTRATION OF A GENERAL SALES TAX

Mr. Adams, a Treasury income-tax expert, says on this point

In the Ways and Means Committee hearings:

"If you have the income tax with all the necessary difficulties and you have the corporation tax with all its necessary difficulties and you have the principal present consumption taxes, it is going to be a dangerous thing from an administrative standpoint to add a general sales tax, which will bring in possibly a million new taxa general sales tax, which will bring in possibly a million new taxpayers to take care of, together with all the added complications of a new and nation-wide tax * * * (p. 23)."

His replies to questions of administration are illuminating:

"Mr. Frear. How many employees does the Treasury Department have engaged in this particular work (collecting taxes)?

"Doctor Anams. I shall have to ask you to let me put that figure in the record (these figures, p. 36, show 18,440 employees).

"Mr. Frear. What would be the number of employees required mediation to cover the final sales tax in checking up?

in addition to cover the final sales tax in checking up?
"Doctor Anams. That depends entirely upon the accuracy with which these reports were checked. You can simply put a sales tax on the statute books and leave it to enforce itself, and it doesn't require very much force to handle it.

"Mr. Frear. But you spoke yesterday of the different forms, and that is my reason for going back to it.
"Doctor Adams. And that ought not be done. We are experiencing a perfectly enormous amount of evasion with respect to some sales taxes, such as are imposed by section 630, the sodafountain drinks and taxes of that kind, because we haven't got an adequate force to check them up and supervise them."

A 100 PER CENT INCREASED PRICE FOR SOFT DRINKS

It is certain that a 1 per cent turnover sales tax would be pyramided, so that in a half dozen or 10 turnovers the padded price in each turnover sale would make a ballooning of prices as wild in character and as burdensome in effect as were war-time prices. Two or three illustrations are readily available.

During a hearing before the Ways and Mear's Committee December 21, Senator Hardwick, now Governor of Georgia, was discussing the effect of a luxury tax on soft drinks, when the following facts were developed:

"Mr. HARDWICK. Bottled goods that have a standard and uni-"Mr. Hardwick. Bottled goods that have a standard and uniform price throughout the country of 5 cents were immediately increased to the consumer (after levying of a 1 per cent luxury tax or one-half cent tax on 5-cent sale) until the article that formerly sold at 5 cents cost the consumer 7 to 10 cents * * *.

"Mr. Frear. Wouldn't that apply, Senator, to the sales tax or-dinarily; that is, without relation to the exact tax which the seller will be obliged to pay? He will place upon goods a price that will make even change.

"Mr. Hardwick. I have no doubt in my own mind, speaking personally, that that is true, and I understand that the gentleman who presented the matter to your committee yesterday admitted that when that is passed on, ultimately, it always gains a little, like the snowball going downhill in wintertime * * * (p. 135). like the snowball going downhill in wintertime * * * (p. 135).

"Mr. Frear. You say that these soft drinks were formerly sold for 5 cents?

"Mr. Hardwick. Yes, sir.
"Mr. Frear. Then what tax was added by Congress?

"Mr. Hardwick. Ten per cent.
"Mr. Frear. Then the same soft drinks were sold for 10 cents?
"Mr. Hardwick. They were sold at from 6 and 7 to 10 cents.

"Mr. Frear. In that case they added ten times the tax did they not, if sold for 10 cents?

"Mr. Hardwick. Undoubtedly."

This increase of 100 per cent in price and 950 per cent tax increase is submitted of the workings of a sales tax.

HOW IT WORKS NOW WITH CIGARS, 400 PER CENT TAX INCREASE

Equally to the point and almost as greatly padded is the proposed price of a cigar from 8 cents to 9 cents, because of a suggested increase in duty of $2 a thousand, or one-fifth of a cent for each cigar. The following from the hearings of January 21 before the Ways and Means Committee illustrates the same evil:

"Mr. Longworth. How much would you add to cover that fifth of a cent ($2 a thousand additional duty)?

Mr. Krauss. We have no medium of exchange for selling goods at fifths of cents.

"Mr. Longworth. How much would it add per cigar? matter of fact, you would add 2 cents, would you not, or would you add a cent? How much would that add to the retail price? It would probably add 1 cent, so that there would be a profit of four-fifths of a cent to the cigar?

"Mr. Krauss. Not to the manufacturer; probably to the dealer.

"Mr. Longworth. If the duty was added, that would be onefifth of a cent for each cigar. According to you that would add 1 cent to the selling price to the consumer, or make a net additional profit of four-fifths of a cent?

"Mr. Washington to the consumer of the constant of the consumer."

Mr. Krauss. Yes; provided you have those units to work with.
Mr. Longworth. * * And you say that would add 2 cents "Mr. LONGWORTH.

to the cost of a cigar?

"Mr. Krauss. I did not say 2 cents, I said probably 1 cent, be-

Mr. Chairman, that principle could be and undoubtedly would be applied to every turnover sales tax where the amount of tax was too small to have any other "intermediate method of exchange."

It must be remembered that the soft-drink and cigar tax was not levied until the sale was made by the wholesaler or retailer to the customer, and these sales did not involve more than two been heretofore disclosed.

Nothing need be added by way of argument to show how vicious and mischievous a turnover sales tax is certain to be when nothing prevents the cupidity of the seller, on the one hand, from taking advantage of the necessity or ignorance of the consumer, on the other, with a well-founded possibility that wholesale evasions of the tax or neglect to report will ensue, as stated in findings of the National Industrial Board's committee.

TAXING AND PADDING FROM PRODUCER TO CONSUMER 400 PER CENT INCREASE

Only one further illustration will be offered. When the railway Only one further illustration will be offered. When the railway bill was before Congress last session, Director General Hines stated that an increase of $875,000,000 in freight rates would mean an increase to the consumer of $4,375,000,000, or 400 per cent increase, because, as stated by Chairman Woolley, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, "The shipper passes this along to the consumer and on back to the producer of the raw material, who has to stand the cost of transportation."

The effect of increased freight rates that has served to prevent any reduction of ordinary commodities to prevent the standard consumer and consumer and on the cost of transportation."

any reduction of ordinary commodities to pre-war prices from a riot of padding and ballooning of prices is also made possible in a sales tax under the beneficent consumption turnover tax plan.

SALES TAX LAWS, WHERE AND HOW ENFORCED TO-DAY

Without attempting to set forth specific terms or scope of existing sales tax laws it is noted that—Canada's sales tax law of 1915 (assented to July 1, 1920) provides for a tax on banking and negotiable instruments. The tax is laid on final sales of various luxuries and on high-priced wearing apparel not ordinarily worn by 10 per cent of the people with a minimum price fixed by law above which the tax applies. A tax also is collected on goods sold by wholesalers and jobbers, but not on plain foodstuffs.

not on plain foodstuffs.

The French turnover tax (1920) applies to luxuries set forth in Schedules A and B of the law as distinguished from necessities and is much like the Canadian law, in that it does not reach necessary foodstuffs. The French law was passed by a government with less than one-third the estimated wealth of our own and with a national debt of $35,000,000,000, or double our own after crediting foreign loans. Its sales tax law, enacted to meet a critical national financial emergency, has been in force less than one year but actual receipts have only receiped about less than one year, but actual receipts have only reached about 47 per cent of those estimated by its advocates when the law was passed. Due to many exemptions and presumable difficulty in administration, Canadian receipts from the sales tax in that country are in like manner disappointing.

The Philippine, 1917, Mexican, 1906, and German, 1920, turnover taxes should each and all delight the hearts of Messrs. Kahn, Bache, and Rothschild, leading exponents of the tax here, although the gentlemen named have not found any of these countries sufficiently attractive to renounce citizenship or residence in the United States because of more agreeable tax laws to be found elsewhere.

The Philippine tax has been pointed to as a model for the United States. Industries in the Philippines are largely found in or around its one large city, Manila, and due to isolation of the islands the law is not difficult to administer. This turnover sales tax is a relic of the old Spanish régime, and the tax was also laid by Spain on Mexico. It is a legacy from a government that notably failed in its cruel administration in both these countries, and curiously enough no law of the kind is in effect in Spain. I quote hereafter as to the Philippine and Mexican methods of administration, if to be applied here, based on statement of H. B. Fernald, of New York City, before the industrial tax board (p. 66, hearings). The Philippine tax has been pointed to as a model for the board (p. 66, hearings).

It is also noteworthy that a statement from Martin R. Browne, It is also noteworthy that a statement from Martin R. Browne, of New York, urging the Philippine sales tax on Congress claims the same rate of tax which raises $7,000,000, or $1 per capita, in the Philippines will raise $2,000,000,000, or $20 per capita, in the United States. In view of the further argument that a sales tax is practically a poll tax based on consumption of each tax-payer, the effect of the argument is clear that the American citizen will pay twenty times as much as the Filipino under the same kind of tax.

Germany's turnover tax law approaches the ideal tax nictured.

Germany's turnover tax law approaches the ideal tax pictured by advocates of the system. Its name there, "umsatzsteuer-gesetz," comprehends several turnovers at the outset. The law gesetz," comprehends several turnovers at the outset. The law levies turnover taxes on sales, both wholesale and retail, but its exemptions thoughtfully cover a number of banking transactions, including exchanges of banknotes, paper money, etc., which exemptions would presumably be urged by "experts" for any law enacted here

A tax of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on necessaries, 15 per cent on sales classed s luxuries, and 10 per cent on all advertisements not connected with public elections in Germany contribute toward the \$57,000,000,000 indemnity burden recently levied by Great Britain, France, and Belgium on a defeated foe, but why should Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, or Goldsmith, its advocates here, collect their pound of flesh from the American laborer, whose needs are to be pound of nesh from the American laborer, whose needs are to be substituted for excess-profits taxes just because that tax is yielded up in Germany through force of arms?

England has repudiated any turnover tax sales law, root or branch. Canada and France are conducting very limited experiments with luxury taxes that are disappointing and irritating in administration and revenue.

The only turnover sales tax laws in governments of comparative importance are found in Mexico and Germany, where the iron hand of revolution has turned over governments and ruthlessly imposed turnover taxes as one of the chief fruits of revolution.

Do we want such laws for the United States? If so, why?

WHO IS PUSHING A SALES TAX?

Let us now examine the "experts" and authorities (?) who are pressing a turnover sales tax on Congress. Singularly none of the 20 members of the tax committees representing two of the largest commercial organizations in the country were called before the Ways and Means Committee to give us the benefit of their study and investigations, nor do these important reports appear anywhere in the hearings, nor has any reference reports appear anywhere in the hearings, nor has any reference been made to them to my knowledge.

Practically the only witnesses who have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, aside from Doctor Adams, of the Treasury Department, are Julius Bache, a banker and broker, New York City; Otto Kahn, a banker and broker, New York City; and Meyer Rothschild, also from New York City; although Mr. Klein and Mr. Goldsmith, "accountants," also appear on different the search of the content of the cont

Mr. Klein and Mr. Goldsmith, "accountants," also appear on different phases of the income tax law as it affects their clients.

Few men realize the amount of money that is involved in the propaganda to enact a turnover sales tax that is being sent out. One of the letters that I have says that 300,000 copies of the pamphlet of Mr. Bache's are being printed, as stated. Mr. Bache and Mr. Rothschild are taking part in the propaganda advocating a turnover sales tax. Why? To relieve themselves and their associates from the excess-profits tax which they are paying and from the surtax on their personal incomes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Frear. I will.

Mr. FREAR. I will.
Mr. Linthicum. Where does the gentleman get the information that Mr. Bache is advocating the turnover tax in order to get rid of the excess-profits tax?

Mr. Frear. If the gentleman will do me the honor to read my remarks in the Record, he will find that he specifically says so. I have a number of documents on my desk to that effect.

Mr. Linthicum. I think the gentleman is making a rash statement.

Mr. FREAR. Not so rash as the gentleman may believe. Mr. Freer. Not so rash as the gentleman may believe. Mr. Bache, when asked by the Industrial National Board Committee on Taxation, "How can you lower the consumption tax?" said, in effect, "By not consuming." The people of the United States are to be invited not to eat, not to wear clothes, in order not to pay the taxes he would have levied. He says, in effect, that 11 months of the year the average taxpayer is spending his time trying to deduce to the says. ing to dodge taxes. He says of Congress that we are subject to the influences of those who confuse the issue for us. Only Bache and a few others of that type are able to determine difficult taxation questions, according to his views. Let me read briefly from his "review," of which 300,000 copies were printed by an ardent admirer. He says:

admirer. He says:

"To continue to raise this amount (four to five billion dollars per year) by excess-profits taxes and heavy income taxes means the complete elimination, in our opinion, of the resources of the investors upon whom this country and its enterprises have been dependent. * * Yet merchants have had to pay out of either income taxes or excess-profits taxes practically all that they have earned over their living expenses. * * An economic tax should be substituted. There is only one way to escape this and that is through a tax on sales, in which every citizen of the United States as well as any foreigner who may live within our shores will pay equally toward the expenses of the Government."

I could quote many other equally happy thoughts suggested by

I could quote many other equally happy thoughts suggested by

Mr. Bache.

Another peculiar circumstance lies in the enormous propaganda for a turnover consumption tax, which has been testified to before our committee by Bache and Rothschild and is evidenced by a constant deluge of addresses and pamphlets from Bache, Kahn, and Rothschild in favor of this tax.

For illustration, a letter from the International Tag Co., Chi-

For illustration, a letter from the International Tag Co., Chicago, dated January 6, 1921, says of a pamphlet issued by Bache: "We—the International Tag Co.—have reprinted and distributed more than 300,000 of them among business men all over the United States." As I am personally compelled to pay for these remarks, I do not feel able to print over 1 per cent of the number of Bache's pamphlet sent out by the tag company alone. With their great financial connections and well-known methods of propaganda it may be assumed that the costs of financing this consumption-tax propaganda is unward of $1,000,000, the esticonsumption-tax propaganda is upward of $1,000,000, the estimate of an older member of the Ways and Means Committee. Such an investment will give a hundredfold return to wealthy interests concerned if a turnover consumption tax can be substituted for the present excess-profits tax.

DISCREDITED "EXPERTS" FAVOR A SALES TAX

Another peculiar fact is that Bache, Kahn, and Rothschild all urged their proposed turnover consumption tax before the National Industrial Conference held in New York City last October, and they were practically the only advocates of that tax there, and they were emphatically turned down, as shown by the committee report heretofore quoted.

In view of the fact that this is the most important revenue measure ever presented to Congress in times of peace, I repeat that it is strange that the discredited "experts," who may not be experts, who were repudiated by the New York conference of 25 industrial associations, have been practically the only men called before our committee to advise Congress on this vastly important revenue measure

Where were Plum, Andrews, Zoller, McKenzie, Howard, and Seligman, the last-named a tax expert of international reputation, Seligman, the last-named a tax expert of international reputation, whereas Bache and Kahn are only New York bankers and stock-brokers who desire to shift their taxes to the shoulders of the multitude? They are not even business men in the broad sense of employing labor.

These New York bankers, brokers, and accountants have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee for the purpose of preventing our feet from going astray. Likewise they have circularized the country repeatedly with their views on excess-profits taxes, which they declare must be repealed, and for a consumption turnover sales tax enacted as a substitute. Due to the air of finality with which they pass upon the duties of Congress and on the "atmospheric" conditions at Washington, a few words are proper to determine the qualifications of these New York "experts" who assume to speak for the best interests of 105,000,000 people whom Congress represents. Criticisms of capabilities, motives, and influences in Congress have been freely indulged in by some of these self-appointed legislative experts and critics, according to propaganda at hand, so that it may be wise to inquire into the surrounding influences and expert knowledge of guides who would direct the feet of Congress in the tax wilderness.

UNIQUE TRAINING OF SALES-TAX EXPERTS

First and foremost is Mr. Otto Kahn, banker and broker; a close First and foremost is Mr. Otto Kahn, banker and broker; a close second is Mr. Julius Simon Bache, same business; while Messrs. Kline, Rothschild, and Goldsmith, all from New York City, speak in general harmony and all work to the same end—to urge upon Congress the necessity of protecting New York bankers who have been vamped by the excess-profits tax and who see their regeneration only through a consumption sale tax law—consumption, because if enacted into law it will consume a large part of the scanty wasne of the 100,000,000 people who have no excess profits but means of the 100,000,000 people who have no excess profits but means of the 100,000,000 people who have no excess profits but whom Congress also represents.

Singularly enough, Germany has no tax system comparable to Mr. Kahn's consumption-tax plan, while Great Britain, which he says has "a wise financial system," holds firmly onto its excessprofits tax. This tax Mr. Kahn wants repealed here, and yet England rejects a turnover sales tax, which he would saddle onto America, the country of his adoption in 1917.

A second tax authority appearing before the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Jules Semon Bache, banker, began business many years ago with Leopold Cohen, another New York banker. Mr. Bache's disinterested judgment on tax matters will be appreciated from the fact that he is reported in the same Who's Who to be a director in the Cuba Distilling Co.; United States Industrial Alcohol Co.; Anniston City Land Co.; American Indemnity Co.; Empire Trust Co.; First Mortgage Guarantee Co.; International Banking Co.; St. Louis & Western Railroad Co., and so forth. In other words, Mr. Jules Semon Bache, banker, is a very busy man but finds a few spare minutes to tell Congress how to legislate, as I shall hereafter submit. The effect of repealing the excess profits law ought to save enormous profits to the various concerns Mr. Bache represents. Bache represents.

Messrs. Rothschild, Goldsmith, and Kline, from New York, are of the same tax "atmospheric" with Mr. Otto Kahn and Mr. Jules Semon Bache, and their efforts to direct Congress in their spare moments from business duties are entitled to weight proportionate to their disinterestedness and general knowledge of the subject. SEVERAL HUNDRED BUSINESS MEN VERSUS THESE SALES-TAX "EXPERTS"

Several hundred large business men have been before the Ways and Means Committee urging modification of the tariff during the past month. The number of men who have addressed us reaches over 500. These men represent hundreds of millions of dollars of business investments and employ hundreds of thousands of men. Every business man before us urged upon the committee the fact that he could compete with all other business men here or abroad if given reasonable tariff protection and could make reasonable profits. Not one complaint came from the hundreds of business men so testifying that they were prevented from doing business or unfairly affected by the excess-profits tax. Not one of these men suggested to the committee that a sales tax of any kind should be substituted for an excess-profits tax. The only men who have pressed these arguments on the committee were Kahn and Bache and Rothschild and Goldsmith, bankers and brokers and accountants of New York City, who toil not and neither do they spin, compared with the hundreds of manufacturers and other employers of hundreds of thousands of day laborers mentioned. over 500. These men represent hundreds of millions of dollars ers mentioned.

Keeping in mind that these last-named New York bankers and Keeping in mind that these last-named New York bankers and brokers are directly interested in shouldering the present excess-profits tax they pay from their own vaults over on the backs of the "people who pay the freight," let me quote their own arguments from the record.

Jules Semon Bache publishes the Bache Review, a weekly pamphlet, which on December 18, 1920, contained this statement cont breedeast throughout the accustory.

pamphiet, which on December 18, 1920, contained this statement sent broadcast throughout the country:

"The atmosphere of Washington is so thick with political misconceptions of things as they really are that it has become a matter of the greatest doubt whether anything sound or sensible can be put through Congress on its merits."

Bache says of his proposals to solve Treasury difficulties by refunding $2,350,000,000 of certificates and Victory notes:

"So sane and sound a proposition as this was met immediately with befogging objections of politically saturated Congressmen who pleaded the old slogan about breaking faith with the people. * * * It never seemed to have occurred to anyone that it would be easy to fund the whole debt in long-term higher-rate bonds."

Mr. Bache's funding scheme contemplated putting higher-rate Government bonds on the market.

Speaking of different hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, Bache says:

"The most practical and workable advice should go out * * * from the best-informed, soundest, and ablest men, especially business men, who will look at the whole subject from the pracnot resent, but Bache says further of Dr. Thomas S. Adams, Treasury expert:

"He calls himself a tax expert * * *. His one object besides throwing dust in the eyes of the people on the question of a turnover tax is to find some complicated, difficult, and illogical substitute for the excess-profits tax."

This was written and circulated by Mr. Bache many weeks after he and his sales-tax proposal had been repudiated by the National Industrial Board Tax Committee. But banker and broker Bache finds a ray of hope notwithstanding Adam's attitude, because in his pamphlet he says:

"We understand that although Mr. Fordney stated openly that they would always have Professor Adams present in formulating the new bill, the members of the Ways and Means Committee state on the side that they are not going to pay any attention to him."

Having bombarded Doctor Adams with this 10-inch shell, fired in the name of the Ways and Means Committee, Herr Bache keeps up a machine-gun fire at the committee with other equally unreliable testimony.

up a machine-gun fire at the committee with other equally unreliable testimony.

"Expert" communications forwarded to Members of Congress from Mr. Bache are supplemented by his statement before the Ways and Means Committee December 17, 1920, from which I briefly quote regarding his proposed sales tax. He says:

"The purchaser does not pay it (the tax) in so much money, but it comes out of the purchase price. You can add it to your price or your bill, but unless the ultimate consumer pays the tax, it is not a sales tax * * * (p. 86).

"It is not a perfect tax. Now, I am only a student. I do not know the tax. Nobody knows that has not seen it working.

* * It will be paid every month, with the least amount of difficulty in raising the money and making the least amount of trouble in a banking community."

difficulty in raising the money and making the least amount of trouble in a banking community."

Mr. Bache, however, disclaims protecting the New York banking community by loading their taxes on the farmers, laborers, and public generally, who would pay a consumption tax. He believes the consumers pay this tax to-day, because he says he shifts it through his business methods. A few words from the hearings are illuminating.

"Mr. Green. You spoke of making additions on account of the excess-profits tax. Where in the excess-profits tax would you make any corresponding reduction?"

"Mr. Rache Frenkly we did

"Mr. Bache. Frankly, we did not. I would like to explain that in justice to my company. We found that our estimates had been too low before.

"Mr. Green. Well, do you know of any company that did?" Mr. Bache. I can only speak of those on whose boards I sit (p. 90).

"Mr. Rainey. Taxation has been defined to be a method of getting the most feathers with the least squawking of the goose.
"Mr. Bache. I agree with that. The sales tax will do that. There is no tax in the world that will ever get so much money (p. 87). If you gentlemen decide that a turnover tax should be tried, and you initiate it at 1 per cent, and you raise $4,000,000,000, you can simply redeem $2,000,000,000 of our debt, and nobody will be very much prejudiced (p. 91).

"Mr. Hull. Your idea, then, is to base this tax and to base all taxes, as nearly as possible, on consumption?
"Mr. Bache. Yes, sir.
"Mr. Hull. So that if a ranchman or a herdsman out in the West should consume more than Mr. Rockefeller, he would pay more taxes.

"Mr. Bache. Yes; if he is foolish enough to do it.
"Mr. Hull. You think that the theory to tax according to ability is unsound?

"Mr. Bache. It is unsound in this country * * * (p. 93).

"Mr. Hull. The corporations made $10,700,000,000 net for one year (the last three and one-half years).

"Mr. Bache. Yes; and you had war to make it for them.

"Mr. Hull. Do you know to what extent organizations are being developed to propagandize its movement and secure the enactment of the (sales) tax?

"Mr. Bache. I can not say that I do. I have come in contact with a number of gentlemen in New York who are engaged with retail organizations who have committees. I know that the American Bankers' Association have appointed a special tax committee in connection with this tax (p. 95).

"Mr. Bacharach. You have spent a great deal of money yourself? (p. 95).

"Mr. Bache. I have spent more than I can afford in view of "Mr. Bache. I have spent more than I can afford in view of my taxes, because I am getting out of business and putting my money into municipal bonds as fast as I can" (p. 96).

Mr. Bache is not a philanthropist; he is living in America to enjoy its privileges, its schools, its laws, and its armies that saved his money from German indemnity. He does not intend to pay for them himself. He lives in luxury, makes money protected by our laws—a wealthy banker and broker—and he tells Congress he is placing all his money in tax-exempt bonds as fast as he can, so others may pay his just tax burdens. If ever a capital tax was others may pay his just tax burdens. If ever a capital tax was justified it appears to be found in the case of Jules Semon Bache, who wants a sales tax placed on the 100,000,000 people that make up the great mass of our population in order to save him the inconvenience of making out an excess-profits tax report and paying his share of taxes.

Mr. Bache has no sentiment or false pretenses to offer. He knows what he wants and is not backward in saying so. Although he stood practically alone among many tax experts and business men at the national industrial session in his extreme demands, he now lays down the law he wants enacted with a "me and Gott" now lays down the law he wants enacted with a "me and Gott" emphasis that speaks highly for his confidence in himself, as once did another gentleman now residing in Holland. Bache wants to escape all taxes, excepting on what he eats, drinks, and wears. With his wealth snugly tucked away in safe-keeping, he says, in effect, he will put every dollar in tax-exempt bonds unless we pass his sales tax and cut the surtax in two. This is his ultimatum, and, as stated, one admirer, a "tag" company, writes Congress it is so captivated by Bache's arguments that it has caused to be printed 300,000 copies of his pamphlet for circulation.

MT LAZERO Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Lazaro. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. Frear. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. How much property is there not being taxed in the United States?

Mr. FREAR. If you accept the statement of Kahn, Rothschild, and Bache, they say the ultimate consumer eventually pays every dollar of the tax himself.

Mr. Lazaro. I am talking about the property that does not bear taxation, property that is exempt from taxation.

Mr. Frear. The gentleman means exempt securities?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. Frear. I can not give the gentleman the exact amount, but it runs into the billions of dollars, four or five billion, and it might be more than that. The figures were given me by Mr. Leffingwell, and I will embody them in my remarks. Those are securities that gentlemen are investing in to-day who object to paying taxes, and by that investment they desire to avoid their fair share of the

Mr. Instruction. The particular by investors of tax-exempt securities is gradually reducing the returns of excess profits.

Mr. Frear Unquestionably, and that is one of the problems the committee will have to contend with. We have got to raise taxes in some way, and the question whether you are to impose it on every man, woman, and child, which would mean a head tax, or secure it from profits is an important question.

I offer the following data from committee hearings of March 11, 1920 (p. 491):

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Leffingwell was questioned Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Leffingwell was questioned regarding outstanding stocks and bonds subject to investment. The purpose of the question was to ascertain what amount of securities were tax exempt and open to investment by those seeking to avoid personal-income taxes.

The data were confined by Mr. Leffingwell to United States securities and the data submitted, as of 1905, afford little information of conditions to-day. As evidence of its inaccuracy I submit a statement of railway securities in 1917 according to the 1920 World Almanac, as follows:

Almanac, as follows

Common stock, $7,454,610,000; preferred stock, $1,847,920,981. Mortgage bonds, $9,227,374,055, amounting to approximately eighteen and one-half billion dollars. If other securities have increased proportionately, the amount of State, county, and municipal bonds have reached over $4,000,000,000, apart from Government bonds that are exempt from taxation. If any accurate data have been compiled on the subject, it has not come to my notice. I quote from Mr. Leffingwell's statement:

"Mr. Frear. One other thing: Is there any place where an estimate can be found of general securities in addition to Government securities? Here are outside commercial securities representing $100,000,000,000, possibly, and I ask whether there is any basis at all for estimating their amount or any authority to indicate the extent of such securities?

"Mr. Leffingwell. I imagine that the statisticians must have some figures as to the whole bulk of securities.

"Mr. Frear. Do you have anything on that which you would be willing to give? If so, just mention the authority, because it seems to me that is very material along this line—the estimated value of all securities on the market.

"Mr. LEFFINGWELL. I will see if I can get those data. I would not be able to give you anything that I can vouch for, because when statisticians take to making figures of that sort without a census they are bound to use figures that are not precisely accurate.

"Mr. Frear. But, anyway, give us some information if you can. "Mr. Leffingwell. Yes."

Taken from Charles A. Conant's the World's Wealth in Negotiable Securities (Atlantic Monthly, January, 1908, p. 102).

On this point Mr. Bache says:
"You may amend your Constitution to make future municipal bonds tax bearing, but yau can not make past ones—I am not a lawyer—but you can not make the $16,000,000,000, or whatever amount there is outstanding, to be taxed; and that is quite large enough to cover our large fortunes." (Page 97, Ways and Means Committee hearings.)

Mr. Bache has estimates of $16,000,000,000, and he may be nearer the correct figures than those based on Leffingwell's data. In any event, Mr. Bache says, "It is quite large enough to cover our large fortunes," and that is the important question involved. In England they have even suggested a capital tax, and it has been contended for very strongly. That is one of the things that we wish to avoid here.

Mr. Linthicum. Had we not better remove some of these securities from taxation?

Mr. Frear. The only way that we can remove them would be by refunding bonds in the form of tax bonds, but beyond that we can only act by amendment to the Constitution, which seems to be the only way, in view of the opinion of the Supreme Court. It will take a long period to secure an amendment to the Constitution that will require all bonds to be subject to Federal taxation.

"WHEN IS A TAX SHIFTED?" BY MR. ROTHSCHILD

Mr. Rothschild ran Kahn and Bache a close race in his testimony before the committee, as will appear from the record:

"Mr. Treadway. Where would the turnover tax go?

"Mr. Rothschild. On the consumer. * * * (p. 108).

"Mr. Frear. Let us suppose competition is keen, then what hap-

'Mr. ROTHSCHILD. Then it is a question of price cutting and that would be regardless of tax.

"Mr. Frear And if there is no competition whatever, does it (excess-profits tax) form any element in price fixing?

"Mr. Rothschild. If there is no competition and its profits are large, it is very largely a question of the policy of the man. I understand lately there was a coal man who had not raised his prices during the war (Mr. Rothschild could not name this white blackbird). * * *

"Mr. FREAR, Suppose that prices are falling, do merchants continue to add excess profits?

"Mr. Rothschild. When prices are falling, men save themselves, and the excess profits do not cut any more ice than the rent or other expenses. * * *
"Mr. Frear. The question of efficiency and of expenditures in every corporation differs?

"Mr. Rothschild. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Frear. Now, do you insist that the excess-profits tax during recent times has been an element in fixing the final cost in various lines of business?

"Mr. Rothschild. Yes, sir.
"Mr. Frear. Is it not a fact that many of these companies have Mr. FREAR. Is it not a fact that many of these companies have been giving out stock dividends reaching 50 per cent and more, and have they not been charging all the public will pay?

"Mr. ROTHSCHILD. Most of them (p. 112).

"Mr. FREAR. Mr. Rothschild, your theory is that the seller is going to add the sales tax when he charges the consumer?

"Mr. ROTHSCHILD. The wholesaler; the retailer will put it into his overlead.

his overhead.

"Mr. Frear. If there are 10 turnovers, there will be 10 people to sell, and they will add the tax in each instance?

"Mr. Rothschild. We will admit that because it is the worst case that could be made against us. It very often will not happen. But we will admit it.

"Mr. Frear. Now, on each one of these turnovers, do you believe that the seller is going to add only the tax in making his sale? Is he going to add the 1 per cent tax, or will he add 4 or 5 per cent additional?

Mr. Rothschild. That would depend upon his competitors.

ROTHSCHILD'S BIG PROPAGANDA

"Mr. GARNER. Now be honest with us. In your heart you would

"Mr. Garner. Now be honest with us. In your heart you would do it if you could (repeal the income tax)?

"Mr. Rothschild. In my heart I believe nearly every dollar of income tax is somehow or other paid through business operations.

" We are going out to the people of the United States and there is going to be a very big campaign to hold up our hands. We are going to have the chambers of commerce and the boards of trade of the United States discuss this question. Now, wherever I have been—and I have had the pleasure recently of talking to the Chambers of Commerce of Boston, Providence, and other places—the merchants almost unanimously favor this tax."

In a 31-page pamphlet furnished the Ways and Means Committee by Meyer Rothschild he says:
"My own personal view is that business, through the medium of a small turnover tax, could well pay the entire cost of economically running the Government, take care of the great national debt, and permit the dropping of all other kinds of Federal taxation. Such an exclusive tax would naturally eliminate the personal-income tax and relieve business from the burden of providing the additional interest dividends or profits which it must now furnish to pay the income tax."

Quoting the effect of an indirect sales tax he says, page 12:

"It is safe to assume that in the past for every dollar the Government has collected, either as duty or imports or excise tax on liquor and tobacco, the consumer paid at least $2 or 100 per cent profit on the duty or excise tax, which additional dollar the Government did not get."

According to Senator Hardwick, heretofore quoted, the increase was ten times the Government tax on a single safe.

MR. KAHN'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE CAUSE

Mr. Kahn also speaks from the standpoint of a banker and broker, whose annual income doubtlessly reaches far beyond the $100,000 mark, possibly double that amount. He speaks from the viewpoint of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., of New York, his business house, who are charged in a recent pamphlet received by all Congressmen with having milked the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad out of $27,-586,650. Letter dated Baltimore, December, 1920, from Isaac M.

Cote.

Mr. Kahn indulges in constant declamations as to his disinterestedness and advises his business associates to use a small stick rather than a bludgeon in driving Congress to drink at the turnover sales trough. Representing Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., and other great financial interests, doubtless he voices their views to an amount reaching many millions of dollars in annual taxes, so it is well to quote from his utterances.

Mr. Kahn is a frequent public speaker—"speech for release," and so forth.

and so forth

and so forth.

In a public address, New York, January 12, 1921, printed on heavy calendered paper—"released for publication at 1 p. m. Wednesday, January 12, 1921"—sent to every Member of Congress, including Ways and Means Committee, he says:

"It is a matter for congratulation that the House Committee on Ways and Means * * is a very competent, well-informed, right-meaning, and level-headed body of men whose standard of ability and devotion to duty would rank high in any assembly, whether of politicians, business men, or men of any other calling."

This is not the judgment as heretofore quoted of his colaborer.

This is not the judgment as heretofore quoted of his colaborer, Bache, by several hundred miles. After passing on the qualifications of a committee for whose benefit this broad flattery was forward by some of its advocates. * * as against a (single) tax on retail sales * * because I doubt whether a retail sales tax, even at a rate four or five times as high as the one-third per cent which I suggest for a turnover tax, would be adequately productive."

He now puts the camel's nose under the tent at one-third of 1 He now puts the camel's nose under the tent at one-third of 1 per cent, which will produce five times the amount of a retail tax, according to his contention. If one-fifth of a cent on cigars is increased five times to 1 cent and 5 cents on soft drinks to 10 cents in present sales, then the total turnover tax at a modest estimate would gain from 50 to 100 per cent in increased price.

In a New York address—"released for publication Monday, December 20, 1920"—Mr. Kahn says:

"As to the sales tax, I admit I have wabbled and wavered on this subject. Indeed, it has taken me a long time to bring myself into a state of assured equilibrium concerning it."

After describing his mental gymnastics, that would do credit to a Blondin of old, he says to the New York business men he is addressing:

is addressing:

"There is one further recommendation which I venture to make, namely, that the business community go slow in sponsoring any methods of taxation which may be calculated to create the impression upon the great body of public opinion that in their contribution to the thought on tax revision the representatives of business are mainly concerned with conserving their own interests and aiming to curtail their due share of the fiscal burden which the country must bear as a legacy of war."

Robbed of its verblage, Mr. Kahn says, in effect:
"Do not announce you are tax dodgers seeking to shift your tax load to the multitude, but when you demand a repeal of the excess-profits law and the enactment instead of a turnover con-excess-profits law and the enactment instead of a turnover consumption tax, just use a strong anesthetic and a sharp knife for the surgical and grafting operation."

In a 41-page pamphlet (January, 1920) demanding the repeal of the excess-profits tax and enactment this time of a 1 per cent sales tax (p. 34), Mr. Kahn says (p. 22):

"Extravagance, logrolling, the unwise and inefficient expenditure of money by governmental bodies, count among the acknowledged foibles of democracy. The structure of our income-tax schedule encourages these foibles. * *

"By the opiate of such taxation, which apparently touches them but very little or not at all, the masses of the people are apt to be lulled into a sense of relative indifference to governmental wastefulness."

Then he proceeds to administer his own chloroform to prove that if these taxes are placed on the people direct, sometimes by a 1 per cent sales tax, sometimes by a one-third of 1 per cent tax, over which he wabbles and wavers, then the effect on the "masses of the people" who will pay the bills will be easier. In a tribute to big business and big business men Mr. Kahn says (n. 25):

says (p. 25): "No doubt "No doubt the prevailing apportionment of monetary reward is not free from defects, but there has been a steady and prois not free from defects, but there has been a steady and pro-nounced tendency and movement, especially within this genera-tion, toward mending such defects and remodeling inequitable conditions. Evolution and the irresistible powers which make for progress, enlightenment, and justice may be depended upon to continue and advance that process. There can be no turning remodeled:

BRITISH AND AMERICAN TAXES

In his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, December 21, 1920, Mr. Kahn further elucidates:
"Mr. Frear. Do they have the excess-profits tax (in Great Britain) now?

"Mr. KAHN. Yes.

"Mr. FREAR. And according to the statement before me it reaches 80 per cent? "Mr. Kahn. Yes.

"Mr. FREAR. You speak of Great Britain as a 'wise financial country.' ('In England which has shown itself in finance a very wise country and has had in that field the largest experience of any country,' p. 15.) Do you think it would be well for us to adopt their plan, or, if not, do you think they should repeal their ss-profits tax?

"Mr. Kahn. I do not think it would be wise for us to adopt their plan ". The leaders of the English business communities, rather unwisely, in my opinion, said they would rather get along with the evils of the excess profits than have a high, flat, corporate tax imposed (p. 164).

"Mr. FREAR. Can you explain, Mr. Kahn, why Great Britain has no sales tax?

"Mr. Kahn. * * They do not like novelties and experiment, especially in the field of finance and economics. .

"Mr. Frear. You would wipe out the excess-profits tax, that would bring $800,000,000 (for 1922), and substitute a sales tax?
"Mr. Kahn. I would substitute for part the sales tax, and in part I would increase the corporation net-profit tax (p. 178).

"Mr. KAHN. On the sales tax I have wabbled and wavered (p.

When asked to make a radical departure in our methods of taxation and inaugurate a system nowhere in effect, on the scale proposed, in any country in the world, Congress and the country have a right to the unqualified approval of some recognized tax expert. That has not been given by any such expert to the Ways and Means Committee, but Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith have contented themselves as special pleaders for the bankers and big business interests that have hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes at stake.

True, Mr. Kahn has been before our committee and fitte around.

True, Mr. Kahn has been before our committee and flits around from one chamber of commerce to another throughout the country, expressing his carefully prepared views, but when before our committee, he confessed with an apparent effort at frankness and ingenuousness that he (Kahn) had "wabbled and wavered" on ne sales tax (p. 166). Before the industrial conference at New York he admitted he still "wabbled and wavered" on a sales tax. (P. 90, industrial committee hearings.)

"Indeed, I am not yet in a state of assured equilibrium," he adds in a communication to Congress (p. 25), and he continues that he, Kahn, a leader in the movement, has long "wabbled and wavered" on a sales tax.

In the most important act of his own career, choosing of citizenship, Mr. Kahn also "wabbled and wavered" from German to English, and finally in 1917 to declaring allegiance to America, and his first important act as a wabbling citizen is to try and lay on the backs of 100,000,000 American citizens a victous sales tax, that represents upward of $800,000,000 annual excess-profits taxes which he asks to have shifted off from the annual profits of his clients and associates. his clients and associates.

THE SALES TAX VERSUS A HEAD TAX

Mr. Chairman, a short expeditious tax collection has been suggested by other authorities, that may yet be urged by Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith on Congress. It is much simpler than the excess-profits tax law, which causes these income authorities to spend sleepless nights in preparing tax reports. It will save them the necessity of investing their large incomes in tax-exempt securities in order to avoid the higher surtaxes. In fact, while it resembles a turnover sales tax, so ably defended by these gentlemen, in that it would reach every man, woman, and child through the food and clothing individually worn, yet it would save the objection of profiting and tax pyramiding which is a conceded evil of the turnover sales tax. It also reaches to the very base of fundamental taxation.

rery base of fundamental taxation.

It is urged Congress could reach the same result advocated by Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith and at the same time avoid a needless pyramiding turnover tax by enacting a poll or head tax. By transferring the $1,000,000,000 of excess profits and surtaxes that now worries those obliged to pay such taxes over to a poll or head tax the tax could not be avoided by the taxpayer and collection annually would then be as easy as taking the census.

Messrs, Kahn, and Bache might urge it be provided by law that Messrs. Kahn and Bache might urge it be provided by law that the head of the house would pay a tax levy of $10 per head for each member of his family, based on the per capita share of each inhabitant who is now asked to shoulder the $1,000,000,000 tax burden of the rich. If any tax was not promptly paid, it might hamper the Government to put the wage earner in jall; so, like the good old distress-for-debt practices in Germany and England, from which some of our modern sales-tax authorities spring, the law might seize a member of the family, say, one of the chilllaw might seize a member of the family, say, one of the children, who Bache says will not pay anyhow if it does not consume, and the wage earner would then be left free to earn the tax.

Take the case of Mr. Bland, a constituent of Congressman Small, with 26 children; his head tax of $10 each would reach $280, which would include himself and his wife. In the case of $280, which would include himself and his wife. In the case of a constituent of my own, with 17 living children, he would only have to raise $190, which would include himself and wife. Of course, these farmers are also paying local taxes on their farms for the support of their schools, local improvements, and State institutions, but they might put in a few extra hours daily in earning the extra tax that Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith would then have taken from their own shoulders, and thus we would avoid the need of a general pyramiding sales tax.

The system suggested would possess the additional virtue of having direct action, and that is what these New York bankers are seeking. True, Bland, the farmer, is probably working 14 hours a day already, while Kahn, Bache, and Rothschild have a minimum unwritten law of nearer four hours, and there may be other matters of detail that would arise, but, as Mr. Kahn well says, "No law is absolutely perfect." However, such a law would solve the mental struggles of excess-profits taxpayers and is well for them to consider as an alternative for the sales tax.

Of course, Congress would take an extended leave of absence after passing any such measure, and probably the next Congress, of different Members, might enact an extreme capital tax which would get more quick profits than under the present excess-profits tax system; but as a temporary relief it is submitted that the kind would get more quick profits than under the present excess-profits tax system; but as a temporary relief it is submitted that the kind of a tax for these distinguished gentlemen to advocate is a head tax, or poll tax, although the latter term would have a singularly unpleasant sound to those who had to submit their candidacies at the polls after enacting the law.

PREJUDICED TAX EXPERTS

Speaking personally, I believe Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and those they represent should be made to pay every dollar of taxes due from them under existing laws, and they should pay taxes according to their ability. Any attempt to avoid payment of taxes by investing in tax-exempt securities ought to be met, so far as possible, by drastic legislation until a constitutional amendment can be passed.

The tax dodger of to-day is not the poor man whose home and farm is immediately sold for taxes, with stiff penalties when it is redeemed. He can not avoid payment of his taxes by investment in tax-free securities or other means, and every dollar spent by him for taxes is ordinarily taken from some need of the family.

The tax dodgers and prejudiced tax experts are not found among

The tax dodgers and prejudiced tax experts are not found among this class of people, but the man who unblushingly tells the Ways and Means Committee he is investing his surplus cash in taxexempt bonds; who publicly says he spends 11 months of the year studying how to evade our tax laws; who says if the poor do not want to pay a sales tax they need not consume; who unblushingly declares in one breath that he shifts all his taxes over onto the ultimate consumer, while in the next breath he demands a repeal of the excess-profits tax, because it is a heavy burden on the rich; the wealthy banker who pompously says to the country in his 6 by 9 pamphlet that only one man on the Ways and Means Committee understands the revenue question, and therefore he—Bache—must come to Washington in order to instruct the committee regarding the tax he wants—this kind of tax expert will find few apologists, even among his own fellows, and he is out of touch with 99 per cent of the 100,000,000 people for whom he asks Congress to pass a sales tax law.

Mr. Denison. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. Denison. Does this proposed plan of a sales tax cover the sales of real estate?

Mr. Frear. That is one tax that has been proposed. It would all depend upon what was embodied in the bill. That has been done in some countries and others not.

WHO WILL PAY THE SALES TAX?

Mr. Chairman, let us for a moment study a picture of human existence and the proposed taxation scheme.

Of the 106,000,000 people in this country it is doubtful if 99 per cent are making $5,000 annually, mentioned in one discussion by Mr. Kahn, nor do they pay any appreciable income tax. Ninety-five per cent certainly are among those who grub along for less, and half of the total presumably are living on net incomes of $1,000 or less received by the family breadwinner. This amount has not much more than one-half the purchasing power amount has not much more than one-half the purchasing power of 10 years ago. In other words, the astounding report that a large part of labor received $700 or less annually 10 years ago was no more serious than conditions of to-day—particularly when over 2,000,000 breadwinners are out of employment. Immaculately dressed Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith do not represent these people.

Those they represent, who clipped bonds or interest coupons during the war, then took no chances. Their living expenses, luxuries, and limousines never occasion them worry now. Yet "excess" profits, not of their reasonable profits but a part of their "excess profits." They declare that individual enterprise, ambition, and initiative will be hampered by parting with any excess profits.

Of the 100,000,000 people whom Congress represents, I believe Of the 100,000,000 people whom Congress represents, I believe statistics would show 90 per cent are no better off to-day financially than before the war, although the great demand for labor during the war is so recent that the country has not yet recovered from its financial orgy to take an accounting of stock. That is the situation confronting the country and Congress when Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith demand that "the burden now upon the rich," to use Kahn's words, must be shifted to the 100,000,000. In other words, that an income of over a billion dollars, counting the excess profits, collections, and higher surtax dollars, counting the excess profits, collections, and higher surtax now paid by less than 5 per cent of our people, must be shifted over to the backs of the remaining 95 per cent by a consumption tax. Under that beneficent proposal every turnover tax will be paid as stated from the time sugar beets are first sold to the last paid as stated from the time sugar beets are first soid to the last sale of refined sugar by retailer; from the sale of wheat at the elevator to the final sale of bread or breakfast food by the grocer; from the sale of the steer or hog by the farmer to the sale of shoes by the retailer or wienerwursts by the lunch stand—and for every eater of porterhouse a score patronize the wienerwursts.

PYRAMIDING FROM PRODUCER TO CONSUMER—WHERE DOES THE RETAILER COME IN?

From five tax levies to 10 tax levies are made between the first From five tax levies to 10 tax levies are made between the list sale and the last of the completed article, depending upon the "turnovers." The tax may be insignificant, but after witnessing the cupidity, greed, and profiteering of the past three years in America, the public must pay, irrespective of cost or reasonable profits, and no sensible man believes that the tax added to the article by the different middlemen from first producer to final consumer will be that fixed by law. If it is 1 per cent with five turnovers it is more likely to be 25 per cent by the time the many turnovers occur and before the finished article is received the turnovers it is more likely to be 25 per cent by the time the many turnovers occur, and before the finished article is received the turnover tax, and much more, is pyramided each time and is added to the cost of the article on which the next turnover tax is levied, as had been disclosed by Senator Hardwick. In many cases it is fair to suppose that where the Government would receive a total of 5 per cent in taxes on the different values for which sold, the consumer will pay from 25 per cent to 50 per cent or even 100 per cent additional, 90 per cent of which additional charge will go into the tills of the different turnover dealers. That is one reason retail merchants and other dealers have no fault to find with the turnover sales tax plan and are easily caught by the find with the turnover sales tax plan and are easily caught by the

That is a reason why Mr. Lew Hahn, managing director of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, is said to be in conference with "members of the Senate Finance Committee and of the Ways and Means Committee of the House." (Washington Times, January 25.)

These retailers do not pay the sales tax which Mr. Hahn and Mr. Kahn and Mr. Bache and Mr. Rothschild and Mr. Goldsmith favor. The retailers are the ones who will pyramid prices and collect from the consumers large margins even as they try to do to-day.

Notwithstanding manufacturers and wholesalers have slashed prices to retailers according to published statements, the large retailer still charges his heavy profit without yet having learned that the war ended more than two years ago. The retailer has nothing to fear from the turnover sales tax because he does not pay it—he passes it on to the consumer and his advocacy of the sales tax is entitled to close scrutiny particularly if he is now seeking to escape paying an excess profits tax through the shift.

EVERYBODY TO PAY THE SAME TAX

Mr. Chairman, a sales tax hits the ultimate consumer who gen-Mr. Chairman, a sales tax hits the ultimate consumer who generally pays the final bill, including freight bills, taxes, and every charge that goes to make up the last selling price. All people will pay the same and thereby can learn the blessings of taxpaying in real earnest. The molder in the foundry will pay the same as Otto Kahn, banker, for his sugar, with the same profits and tax added in both cases; the miner digging coal will pay the same as Jules Bache, New York banker, for the meat, flour, and potatoes with the same tax added; the farmer will pay the same as Rothschild and Goldsmith for the same grade of shoes, shirts, or clothes, with the same tax added, although neither Kahn nor Bache nor Rothschild will draw heavily on the kind of goods the Bache nor Rothschild will draw heavily on the kind of goods the farmer or laborer wears. The workman with his flivver will pay the same tax on his gasoline that Rockefeller himself pays, in order to pile up excess profits for Standard Oil that are no longer to be taxed according to Messrs. Bache, Kahn, Goldsmith, and Rothschild.

The farmer will pay the new price for his ax and other tools that Carnegie exacts through the Steel Trust, and the excess-profits tax formerly paid by the trust is now to be shifted to the final purchaser—in order not to destroy initiative in business. The soldiers whom we sent to war to protect the property of Kahn et al. from German tribute—these service men who saved the day—will now pay the same turnover tax as Kahn et al. This is the beneficent scheme known as a consumption tax, or a turnover sales tax, that these bankers and financiers ask Congress to place on the backs of the 100,000,000 people whom we represent

In a hope of escaping excess-profits taxes the proponents of the repeal paint in somber colors the terrible distress of busi-ness occasioned by the excess-profits tax and the beautiful picture of every man bearing his own share of the burden under a consumption sales tax.

Every business reverse, every annoyance, is laid to the excessrofits tax. When prices were high Kahn et al. claimed prices were high because the excess profits were always added. When the balloon burst and prices dropped Kahn et al. pointed to the drop as a business distress caused by the drain of an excess-profits tax. Notwithstanding the tax only reaches a part of the excess profits over reasonable profits of 8 per cent, the tax is protested by many men who pay it in the same breath that they confidently declare they pass the tax on to the other fellow.

One ounce of fact is worth a ton of theory, and a few unprejudiced witnesses are worth all the Kahns, Baches, Rothschilds, and Goldsmiths in the universe who are special pleaders for special interests.

As heretofore stated, several hundred witnesses appeared before the Ways and Means Committee on tariff schedules. They employ hundreds of thousands of men in the aggregate and have paid many millions of dollars in excess-profits taxes on their factory earnings in the aggregate, yet not one of these men complained of the excess profits law as a hindrance to his business nor as a bar to incentive. Search the hearings of these hundreds of witnesses, and not one seconds the demand of Messrs. Otto Kahn, Jules Bache, Rothschilds, and Goldsmith, bankers, brokers, and special pleaders. What more significant illustration of the difference in attitude between the coupon-clipping and stock-market juggling business compared to actual producers, employers of labor, and contributors to the country's prosperity? It is the difference between the broker and the producer, whether he be farmer, factory hand, or manufacturer. farmer, factory hand, or manufacturer.

I respectfully submit that it is the height of folly to remove the excess-profits tax now paid by industries named and to place it on the backs of consumers as proposed by Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and others before the Ways and Means Committee.

REAL TAX AUTHORITIES VERSUS "WOBBLERS AND WAVERERS" Thus far I have presented to you the findings of two important Thus far I have presented to you the findings of two important tax committees, representing thousands of manufacturers and hundreds of chambers of commerce throughout the country. These findings in both cases specifically repudiate a consumption tax and point out dangers which would not occur to novices or superficial students of the subject. I have also quoted from the Secretary of the Treasury's report specifically rejecting a consumption tax both in principle and as an administrative proposition

Quotations have also been furnished showing conclusively that taxes are loaded, and this heavy load in addition to the tax will taxes are loaded, and this heavy load in addition to the tax will be passed on to the consumer under a turnover consumption tax. These high authorities are opposed by several New York bankers, brokers, and accountants, one of whom, Mr. Kahn, has "wobbled and wavered" for many months and has not yet found his equilibrium. Mr. Bache goes Mr. Kahn one better, as I have shown, and says all income taxes and all corporation taxes should be wiped out and a turnover consumption tax substituted. He adds that he is placing his own funds in tax-exempt securities as rapidly as possible. Mr. Rothschild believes like Mr. Bache, but does not advocate going the limit at this time. These three experts were before the National Industrial Board tax committee and their untested theories were there rejected. However, they are persistent; they have millions of dollars in annual taxes at stake among those they represent; they have a vigorous, expensive propaganda and are well organized. propaganda and are well organized.

They were practically the only witnesses, by a curious circumstance, on the subject before the Ways and Means Committee, except Doctor Adams; and Bache informs the country in his pam-except Doctor Adams; and Bache informs the country in his pamphlet that he has grapevine intelligence, that Adams does not count with the Ways and Means Committee when it comes to preparing a bill. These are the financially interested witnesses who are seeking to have Congress relieve them of their taxes and to saddle their tax burdens on the general public.

They point to Canada, Philippines, and France to prove that a turnover sales tax is desirable for the United States. At the risk of appearing to give undue weight to their arguments, I will quote from the opinions of men who have given the tax subject here and abroad profound and exhaustive study. If the conclusions of the tax committee, already quoted, were convincing, the reasons advanced by the following witnesses are conclusive:

TESTIMONY OF TAX EXPERTS AGAINST A SALES TAX

Arthur A. Ballantine, attorney at law, New York City, formerly Solicitor of Internal Revenue, says, page 32, hearings national industrial tax committee:

"I believe that this idea of a sales tax, a tax collected everywhere, falling on no one, is a will-o'-the-wisp which has floated over this field of taxation and which is in danger of luring business men who approach Congress in an effort to get really beneficial changes into futile action instead of constructive action.

"I believe that this committee by the very careful and avery carefu

"I believe that this committee, by the very careful and ex-haustive consideration which it has given to the advocates of this plan and its careful thought as to conclusions, has done much to dissipate this myth and to direct the efforts of business men into practical channels instead of down a pathway which leads to futility

For the second witness I quote from Charles A. Andrews, whose frank, clear analysis of the sales tax is illuminating. He says

(p. 38):
"There was on the committee no vociferous objector to the sales tax. There was on the committee nobody who was loaded to kill it. We started in upon the assumption that we were going to kill it. We started in upon the assumption that we were going to work out something in the form of a sales tax. We invited various well-informed people to come before us. We reached out and got printed matter and manuscripts. We made investigations; and slowly but steadily the committee was driven to the inevitable conclusion that it, representing a large body of business men, could not bring before this conference a recommendation for any form of sales tax, except as the same related to a few specific particles. articles, suggestions as to which we have made, and which have been referred to by Mr. Armitage.
"We haven't the nerve, as good citizens of the country-we helieve we are, and are trying to be—to say to a body of business men in this country, who are suggesting that business be relieved from a billion dollars of excess-profits tax, that we propose a tax which will cause the billion to be paid by the ultimate consumer. That is such a violent divergence from the principle of sumer. That is such a violent divergence from the principle of payment upon the basis of ability to pay that we can not ask this body of business men to get behind that sort of a tax.

"We do not believe, in this day and generation—and following the World War, instead of following the Napoleonic wars—that we have any business to propose seriously to the Congress of the United States a tax of a billion dollars, or two, or three (I don't know how much it would produce—all those figures are given), to be paid by the ultimate consumer, and organized business excused from its billion dollars of excess-profits tax.

"We don't think that is good citizenship; and we don't think that is good economics. That is the real reason that we disposed of or rejected the sales tax, upon the assumption that the tax is paid by the ultimate consumer.

paid by the ultimate consumer. . .

"Well, let us assume that the tax all remained with the original payer of it, and that it is not passed on to the consumer. Does it then become a tax which we can justify ourselves in recommending to Congress? Your committee says 'No.' * * * Why? If the tax remains with the individual or concern which originally pays it, and he is not able to pass it on, it becomes a tax measured in terms, although not so stated, of his gross receipts; and as such, in the opinion of your committee, it is open to such serious objections that we can not ask Congress to pass it. * * * A tax on gross receipts which leaves out of the equation all the difon gross receipts which leaves out of the equation all the difference in cost of the conduct of your business as compared to mine—perhaps it takes 90 per cent of my gross receipts to conduct my business and pay my expenses; perhaps it takes 50 per cent, or 70 per cent, or 95 per cent of yours—is an unjustifiable tax.

* * The establishment of a tax like that would, in the opin— * * The establishment of a tax like that would, in the opinion of your committee, produce such inequalities that our dissatisfaction with the excess-profits tax would be as nothing, and we would find ourselves in the face of inequalities vastly greater than heretofore. * * It is uneconomic in its nature; it is indefensible, in our opinion, in the twentieth century, if it is a general tax on all consumptions; and for other reasons it is equally indefensible if it becomes a tax in terms of gross receipts, which term means nothing so far as it relates to the ability to pay taxes."

Mr Jules Bache called as a hostile witness before that com-

Mr. Jules Bache, called as a hostile witness before that committee, gives his own concept of human nature and a cold-blooded alternative for the ultimate consumer who can not pay the tax. He says, "Quit consuming." I quote from his statement before the industrial committee (p. 58):

"Professor Adams this morning showed the greatest optimism that I have ever heard voiced from the tribune. He states that he believed the taxpayer was a cheerful, voluntary honest man. That is not my opinion. The taxpayer—and I am not attacking his honesty when I say so—spends 11 months a year devising schemes by which, during the 1 month that he tries to make up his tax statement he can avoid as many of the taxes as is legally possible, and he generally succeeds in avoiding many of them.

"The idea of putting a thrift tax into our taxes, which the 20 per cent limitation would be, is an excellent one; but the greatest thrift tax would be the turnover tax, since if anybody didn't want to pay any taxes he could merely refrain from consuming."

THE CANADIAN TAX IS NOT A SALES TAX

W. C. Cornwell, an employee of Mr. Bache, read a statement of the Canadian sales tax at that same meeting—page 60—to which Robert G. Wilson, chief of the tax division, American Mining Congress, immediately replied, as follows:

"I don't know how many gentlemen present are familiar with the Canadian law, but it has been my fortune within the last three or four years to spend some time in Canada, and for business reasons make some intensive study of the Canadian law. To my mind the Canadian law is not a sales tax.

"In the first place, the law of July 1, known in the United States as a sales tax, is an amendment to the special war revenue act of 1915, which is an excise tax law.

"What Mr. Cornwell has had to say regarding the Premier's statement is true. The statement, however, is misleading in that it refers to a sales tax, which in its effect exempts all the prime essentials of life from such taxes; it is only an addition at the rate of 1 per cent and 2 per cent to excise taxes—luxury taxes, if you please—which rise sometimes 50 per cent upon many com-modities—luxuries, essentials, and nonessentials. It is not, as the business men's tax committee has termed the proposition, a sales tax.'

For the next witness I call Mr. J. F. Zoller, tax attorney of the General Electric Co. He says at the same committee hearings, page 62:

"I want to talk just a minute on the sales tax. Now, we have reached the parting of the ways here in regard to the sales tax. Personally, I am opposed to it for the reasons stated by Mr. Andrews. I can't state those objections any better or as well as he did. But the situation as I see it is this: The people who are favoring the sales tax are those who are already required to pay a sales tax under section 900 of the present law, and their position is that if the Government can select this industry and impose a sales tax upon us why not spread it to other taxpayers?

THE PHILIPPINE TAX DISCUSSED

Replying to a statement filed by a Mr. Hord, formerly collector of internal revenue of the Philippines, the next witness, Mr. H. B. Fernald, of Loomis, Suffern & Fernald, New York, says, page 66:

"The sales tax has been spoken of as if it were a new thing of very recent years. From my experience with the sales tax I go back to two things—one is the matter of the Philippine tax, the other the matter of the Mexican tax. * * Do you want to place in your business a proposition where every purchaser is to place in your pushess a proposition where every purchaser is to get a receipt on which you are to affix serially numbered stamps, and where you have to account for all your stamps purchased and issued, subject to examination from time to time, to check up as to the number you have left and when you purchase them, and where you have to put down the last serial number you purchased and the serial number you are acquiring now?

"My objection to the sales tax is particularly from this stand-point and it is the same thing which will apply to almost any for

"My objection to the sales tax is particularly from this standpoint, and it is the same thing which will apply to almost any tax, namely, when a tax gets large in amount and it becomes worth while the taxpayer will look for a means to avoid it. * * It can be eliminated; it can be gotten around. The experience in Mexico has shown that conclusively, and therefore it is a tax which will be paid by the small man, while the large man, who is able to change his business organization, can avoid it."

WHY ENGLAND REJECTS A SALES TAX

The next witness is James J. Forstall, of Chicago, attorney at law and member of the tax committee, who speaks of efforts to pass a sales tax in Great Britain, the former home of Mr. Kahn.

Comment has been made on Canada and Mexico. "Comment has been made on Canada and Mexico. I would like to say that two weeks ago yesterday, through the courtesy of Professor Haig, I had an opportunity to discuss with one of the members of the British income-tax commission and with one of the high tax officials of the British Government the question of the British taxation situation. As you probably all know, they have about as little love for the excess-profits duty as the Americans have for the excess-profits tax, and have been spending two years in trying to find a substitute, but they haven't yet found it. I asked each of those gentlemen whether the general sales tax has been considered as a substitute, and they both said the same thing: That it had been taken up and considered very seriously. been considered as a substitute, and they both said the same thing: That it had been taken up and considered very seriously, but that now they were no longer considering it, because they were convinced that it was neither an equitable tax nor feasible from an administrative standpoint, nor one which could possibly be passed through Parliament."

For the next witness I quote from A. E. Holcombe, New York, secretary and treasurer of the National Tax Association. He says: "I happen to have with me a copy of a bulletin which is just about to come out, and in view of the references to other countries I thought I might read a couple of sentences from the report on the Mexican situation. It seems that early in the Carranza régime he established a committee to look into the entire financial system in Mexico. That committee made an elaborate report, and it has been reviewed by Professor Chandler, of Columbia, who

"It is perhaps not too much to say that the most important proposal to be found in the entire model plan (and that was the name given to this report) is that recommending the suppression of the sales tax throughout the States of Mexico. * * It has always been a costly tax to collect, and according to the opinion of Mexican officials, who are in a position to know, it has constituted one of the most cumbersome impediments to industry and commerce."

HOW FARMERS REGARD A SALES TAX

The next witness, J. R. Howard, of Chicago, speaks for a million and a half farmers in the American Farm Bureau Federation. He speaks the sentiments of several million other farmers not connected with the organization, of which he is president. He says (p. 68):

"The farmer is interested in paying his just and fair proportion of taxation. He believes every man, every citizen, should pay some tax, because it makes him a better citizen, but he believes that that taxation should be so distributed as to be fair and equitable, and in proportion to each man's ability to pay.

"With regard to the sales tax, let me say that the farmer occuples a unique position. I think it has generally been conceded in this discussion that the tax is passed down to the ultimate consumer. The farmer can pass nothing to the ultimate consumer, because he buys at the other man's price and sells at the other man's price and sells at the other man's price, and being at that disadvantage and not able to pass it on, he bears an unjust burden and is in a place where I am sure he, as a farmer, will object to the broad extension of the sales-tax principle."

Mr. H. C. McKenzie, of Walton, N. Y., a member of the tax committee, seconded Mr. Howard's testimony in vigorous language, as

I want to take the opportunity to emphasize the farmer's ob-"I want to take the opportunity to emphasize the farmer's objections to a general sales tax, which have been voiced by our president, Mr. Howard, and to call your attention to just two or three things briefly. * * The chief proponent of the sales tax has told you that the excess-profits tax is not only paid by the ultimate consumer, but that the ultimate consumer pays the tax two or three times in amount. Now, if that is right, the corporations and people who are doing this business are receiving a benefit from the excess-profits tax, and the corporations and business people are the people who are asking for its repeal; they are asking for something that is diametrically opposed to their own interests. for something that is diametrically opposed to their own interests. According to the chief proponents of the sales tax, the sales tax is paid by the ultimate consumer in its entirety; that is his proposition, as I understand it.

"Now, your proposition, as developed by the advocates of the sales tax, is this: To take an approximate $1,000,000,000 off the excess-profits tax, which is not paid, as I contend, largely by the corporations, and put it over, according to the proponents of the corporations, and put it over, according to the proponents of the sales tax, on the ultimate consumer. It seems to me that nothing could be more shortsighted, and tend in the end to be a boomerang and to be a disadvantage not only to business but to capital, than to strive to shift the burden of a billion dollars from the business people who now pay it to the living wage—which is what it amounts to—the ultimate consumer. Ninety per cent or 95 per cent of that tax will be paid out of the living wage, if the contention of the proponents of the sales tax is correct; and I want to say that the farmers who are represented in the American Farm Bureau Federation will never in the world stand for that proposi-tion."

FARMERS WILL FIGHT TO THE END

Let me interject a witness at this point whose tenderness for Let me interject a witness at this point whose tenderness for wealth and capital has no conspicuous place in his published statement, from which I quote. I offer an extract from an article given to the press a few days ago by George P. Hampton, managing director of the Farmers National Council, an organization representing an enormous constituency. No one will doubt that equally forceful demands are voiced by the millions of organized and unorganized labor who are to be placed in the new class of turnover sales taxnevers. Mr. Hampton says:

turnover-sales taxpayers. Mr. Hampton says:

"In 1918 [Mr. Hampton states] 22,696 millionaires were estimated by the eminent publicist, Mr. Richard Spillane, to own 27.2 per cent of the national wealth, or over $68,000,000,000, while the 33 richest Americans owned property worth about $4,837,000,000, or, roughly, 2 per cent of the national wealth. In 1918 the national wealth was estimated to be $250,000,000,000. It is now estimated to be $500,000,000,000. Our 23,000 millionaires are probably worth now about $136,000,000,000 and the 33 richest Americans about $9,675,000,000.

"If we estimate the net return on this property at only 5 per cent, the average income of these 23,000 millionaires is nearly $300,000. Of course, many of them have invested largely in taxexempt bonds and own a considerable proportion of the $40,000,000,000 of such tax-exempt bonds. While a constitutional amendment would enable the Government to tax the income of these individuals, it will take some time to adopt such an amendment. A direct tax, however, could be levied upon capital values, and should be promptly levied by Congress instead of seeking some method of placing additional burdens of taxation through a retail sales tax, a general sales tax, and other consumption taxes upon the hundreds of thousands of families who to-day are receiving several hundreds of dollars less than they need to maintain the American standard of living. * * A retail sales tax and other sales taxes and all similar taxes on food, clothing, and shelter, called consumption taxes, must be paid chiefly by the workers on the farms, in factories, mines, and transportation, millions of whom are getting less than the minimum wage necessary to maintain a family on a decent American standard.

Mr. Hampton concludes:
"The full money cost of the war must be paid by taxes on in-The full money cost of the war must be paid by taxes on incomes, corporation profits, estates, and privileges. Such taxes will yield $7,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000 a year for many years without imposing any hardship upon anyone. American farmers who this year have lost billions through the slump in farm prices, will fight to the end the plan for the selfish privileged interests to saddle the huge war debt upon our people for years and insist upon prompt payment of that debt by those who profited so hugely by the war and by the monopolies built up in the country before and the war and by the monopolies built up in this country before and during the war."

A RECOGNIZED GREAT TAX AUTHORITY ON THE SALES TAX

I could quote from many other witnesses who have not "wobbled and wavered" for months, but the witnesses I have cited against the sales tax are tax students and authorities, men who have given the question thorough consideration in most cases, are apparently unprejudiced, and whose views are of great value in determining matters of taxation. One of the greatest international tax authorities, whose textbooks are known to every student of taxation, has expressed himself on the subject of a turn-over sales tax as late as October 22 last. His contribution on the sales tax here and abroad is concise, fair, and positive. I quote from the statement of Dr. E. R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University (national industrial tax committee hearings, p. 72):

"The sales tax is not a novel tax, as the Premier of Canada said.
If he hear followed an experience course, in taxation he could have

If he has followed an academic course in taxation he could have learned of many examples, dating back as far as thousands of years ago. The Romans had it, not to speak of the Egyptians and the Babylonians. I do not want to give a lecture on taxation; I am simply trying to call attention to the fact that the sales tax has existed in one form or another for a great many years. With only two exceptions, it has been abolished everywhere and has not been two exceptions, it has been abolished everywhere and has not been reintroduced in any first-class country; and those two exceptions are Germany, which reintroduced it in 1919, and France, which, as has been said, introduced it in 1920. Now, before we consider the experiences with this tax, it must be remembered that we can learn little, one way or another, either for or against it from Mexico, or Cuba, or the Philippines, or Canada, all of which are countries of insignificant economic proportions, where we do not find the real kind of sales tax that we have been discussing to-day."

Again (p. 74):

Again (p. 74):

"The proposition now is to take off one of those three chief categories—the tax on excess profits—and remove the burden from profits on wealth or income, and put it on the other or consumption side. This would, in my opinion, unduly shift the balance and bring us too near the position formerly occupied by all balance and bring us too hear the position formerly occupied by all the aristocracies of old, and still reflected in some of the European countries. * * * (P. 75:) Why is it that England and America show their democracy, their real democracy, so much more than countries in the difficult position of Italy or France or Germany? There you will find throughout the war and even now the great mass of taxes imposed upon the consumption of the common man; whereas in England and in the United States during the Great Way as over country our experiences in the Givet. ing the Great War, as over against our experiences in the Civil War, the great majority of taxes are raised from wealth; that is, from those who can afford to pay, rather than from the consumption of the necessaries and comforts of life. * * * After the United States, the two countries of the world which are making the most progress in fiscal reform are England and Italy—for Italy is doing better than France. When these two countries came to consider this problem they went into the question of a sales tax thoroughly and finally rejected it. On the other hand, the two big countries of the world that have adopted the sales the two big countries of the world that have adopted the sales tax—Germany and France—did so only as a last resort, after exhausting every other available source of taxation. * * * Germany was forced to this sales tax in the last extremity, and in France the same is true. * * * I have been in California for eight months, and had the pleasure some time ago of addressing a large body of business men in San Francisco assembled to discuss this question. I found that the situation was precisely that which was presented by our committee. Everyone was anxious cuss this question. I found that the situation was precisely that which was presented by our committee. Everyone was anxious to get rid of the profits tax, everyone had heard that here was a way out, and it captivated them all; every man in that room was in favor of a general sales tax. But after I had talked with them, not so much in opposition as trying to show that there was another side of the question which they must begin to study, it was marvelous to see what a change came over them; not because I spoke—because everyone would have done just as well—but simply because attention was now called to some of the less obvious aspects of the case.

A sales tax on the sales of capital would ruin New York City as the financial center of the country. A sales tax on the necessaries of life would evoke a political struggle the like of which we saries of life would evoke a political struggle the like of which we have never seen in this country (p. 77).

"The sales tax represents an attempt to put an undue, an extravagant burden upon the consumer, instead of on the producer or the possessor of wealth (p. 79)."

Doctor Seligman discloses why Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and others of like antecedents from the "aristocracies of old" favor a sales tax.

L will will have been my collection in Communication.

I will willingly leave my colleagues in Congress to say whose advice is to be considered. Shall it be that of a man whose judgment is not warped by personal or pecuniary interests, who handles the subject with the mind of a master, whose opinion is supported by two great tax-investigating committees, by the experts of the Treasury, who have spoken through Secretary Houston, and by a dozen reputable witnesses quoted? Whom shall we follow in placing a billion-dollar tax on the backs of the people? Shall we accept these authorities or shall it be the wabbler and waverer banker and broker with his New York colleague, who spends 11 months a year, according to his own admission, in trying to dodge taxes? There can be but one answer.

LEST WE FORGET

Mr. Chairman, a terrible war has swept over the world, leaving sorrow and misery strewn everywhere along the trail. The struggle with arms registered over a score of million men dead, wounded, or missing, but this was only one item of the losses. Social, industrial, and governmental upheavals have spread like a prairie fire from the war confiagration.

In our own land innumerable battles have been fought, as bitter and lasting in effect as those occurring over 3,000 miles away. No statistics will ever record the broken homes, sicknesses, sacrifices, and deaths that have no place in history's battles nor of secret struggles when giving away millions of their best treasures—their boys. Nor will history ever properly record the taking of everything not nailed down during that war by profiteers who robbed the Government and robbed the public without limit or conscience. Scars are not yet healed, for the people have long memories.

Fortunes have been amassed and laid away that were wrung from the necessities of our Nation and of the people. That is from the necessities of our Nation and of the people. That is only one chapter from the record, but that is a chapter with which we are now concerned because profiteering and pilfering of the public has been a continuous performance whenever opportunity exists, and it is brought forcibly to mind by the proposal to repeal the excess-profits law and enact a general sales tax.

In a report from the Department of Labor of January 26, just issued, the statement is made that 3.473.466 jobs have been lost within the past year and industry has been reduced approximately 40 per cent. In the face of this record Congress is now asked to exempt from taxation those who accumulated enormous profits in great corporate business and also to slash deep the asked to exempt from taxation those who accumulated enormous profits in great corporate business and also to slash deep the surtaxes of those whose individual incomes reach high levels. According to Bache, who heads the sales-tax propagandists, these taxes now paid out of large profits and high incomes should be shifted on to the three and a half million jobless, who with their dependents must buy food, heat, and clothes, with an alternative, according to Bache, expressed with grim humor, "to merely refrain from consuming" (p. 53).

That advice is more cruel than Marie Antoinette's "If they frain from consuming" (p. 53).

That advice is more cruel than Marie Antoinette's, "If they can't get bread, why not eat cake?" Bache has many disciples in this country, and in the world to-day, but only the blind fail to see that an autocracy of wealth may become the handmaid of a military autocracy which the world has temporarily destroyed.

Those who try to view conditions without bitterness or prejudice find the greatest danger to our body politic to-day lies in the ruthless crushing of the individual, the cupidity and selfish-ness of men, and a modern-day arrogance of wealth, that in turn ness of men, and a modern-day arrogance of wealth, that in turn demands its protection from those whom it crushes.

In this day of world-wide commercial struggles, when the individual becomes swallowed up in the maelstrom, it is well to remember that under our form of government the humblest and poorest is entitled to equal rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, unless it is to become a lost paragraph from our Constitution, and that next to liberty the most frequent cause for historic struggles has come from unjust taxation, with its accompanying oppression.

OTHER TAX ISSUES NOT DISCUSSED

I have presented what I believe to be facts and authorities that effectually discredit the present effort to saddle a turnover sales tax on the people of this country. One of the greatest campaigns for the tax is now being waged in Washington and throughout the country. The stakes are higher than with any legislative program in recent years because the plan proposes to shift the $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 in excess-profits taxes over on to the underfellow.

Money is plentifully supplied to press this propaganda upon Congress. Every man who pays excess-profits taxes in Congress will be pressed to join the movement, irrespective of economic, governmental, or political results. I have not sought to discuss the repeal of excess-profits taxes nor the proper limit to place on personal income surtaxes. Nor have I assumed to discuss a constitutional amendment that will reach the hoarded wealth of Jules Semon Bache and others who invest their wealth in tax-exempt securities.

I have not presented the alternative of taxing capital now being pressed in other countries, notably England, and by large farming organizations and some labor organizations in our own country, nor have I dwelt on the fact that while England refuses to give up her excess-profits tax and rejects a sales tax without any consideration, special interests most concerned here, following the example of the railway bill propaganda of last year, are straining every nerve to do here what England dare not do across the water, and I use the term "dare not" ad-

THE PRICE IS TOO GREAT TO PAY

I have not discussed the political liability of a turnover consumption tax, nor have I indulged in useless predictions of what reward will be measured out to Representatives who listen to the siren song of the propagandists and fail to represent those back home, those who will be called on to pay the bill—a billion-dollar tax bill—in addition to other taxes, local and Federal. These are the fruitful fields for discussion and may be covered before any turnover consumption tax is passed by Congress. I have tried to place before you the judgment of recognized experts, expressed both individually and through united action, all of whom condemn the passage of a general sales tax in this country in time of peace. Their views have not been given to Congress in any public hearings, to my knowledge, although sales-tax advocates, led by an amateur expert who wobbles and wavers, has been given full hearings by our committee with accompanying wide given full hearings by our committee with accompanying wide publicity through the press.

To my own mind, the time is one of great concern. The future does not rest alone on the resumption of business but also on the willingness of men of large means to shoulder their full share of governmental and tax burdens. Temporary success of any salestax measure will be at the expense of respect for property and of those who succeed.

The price is too great, and one that even those drunk with power may well hesitate to pay.

I have made the assertion that powerful agencies are now waiting for the action of Congress in order to help them avoid an income tax. This statement is supported by cumulative testimony furnished by witnesses who were quoted in my speech of April 14, 1921, when the last sales tax was being pressed in the House for passage. I then

INVESTIGATE THE SALES-TAX LOBBY

"In every congressional district in the country" a campaign is being waged by the sales-tax lobby to shift an excess-profits tax on corporations reaching nearly $800,000,000 annually to a sales tax on everything the people eat, drink, and wear. An investigation is demanded of the slush fund thus raised and of methods used by the lobby.

Mr. Frear Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on a subject which is closely connected with that which we are discussing to-day, and yet is not the emergency tariff bill. I would that others more capable could have undertaken it, but I do not believe I have any right to remain silent in view of conditions that should be disclosed to the House at this time.

There is an element, not in the House particularly, but in the country, that is insisting on a tax on everything we cat, drink, or wear through a sales tax, and effort is being made to put that through at this time. I want to discuss that proposal briefly.

Let me say, first, that the National Industrial Conference Board, which represents millions of dollars in capitalization and represents millions of men in its employ, has reported, through its committee, against this tax. The United States Chamber of Commerce Tax Committee, similarly constituted, representing all Commerce Tax Committee, similarly constituted, representing all of the chambers of the United States, has reported against that tax, and so has the National Credit Men's Association. What do you suppose would be the verdict if it was submitted to the millions and millions of farmers and men working in the factories and shops to-day, as well as the clerks and others, if they were to decide upon paying the tax that is to be shifted from the excess profits? That is the proposition proposed at this time. Now, I have to-day on my desk 145 letters received from candy makers alone demanding a sales tax. I have between 500 and 600 from jewelers, from druggists, from various classes of people who want to have the tax shifted from them over on the backs of the people of the country, and therefore demand a sales tax. We have newspapers and pamphlets galore for a sales tax. Let me read to you from some of them so that you will understand the extent of the propaganda.

read to you from some of them so that you will understand the extent of the propaganda.

Here is a full-page advertisement headed "The Bubble Has Burst." It is from the Wall Street Journal that editorially has criticized me severely for the position I have taken against a sales tax. I want to call your attention to the words of this full-page advertisement. And I understand it was carried in other papers throughout the country.

On page 7 of the Wall Street Journal of March 17, 1921, it says:

"M. Francois-Marsal, the banker finance minister, is credited with having discovered a veritable philosopher's stone in the new tax on turnover. The yield is already proving unexpectedly satis-tax on turnover. The yield is already proving unexpectedly satisfactory, and there appears to be every reason that it will produce a much greater amount than had been anticipated in the budget estimates."

As a matter of fact, every intelligent man familiar with the French sales tax—and the man who wrote that is intelligent—knows that only 37 per cent of sales-tax estimates is being collected in France.

lected in France.

If France is unsuccessful, how can we hope for different results? In France the budget estimates of 467,000,000 and 413,000,000 francs for January and February fell down to 187,000,000 and 151,000,000 for those months as stated, or to 37 per cent of estimates, and are dropping proportionately every month. In the April monthly letter Hamilton Institute, I quote a French cable: "The yield of the French business turnover tax, which became effective July 1, 1920, has proved decidedly disappointing. * * *

The measure has proved cumbersome and unpopular. * * In each month so far the proceeds have been less than those of the

each month so far the proceeds have been less than those of the preceding month."

The "letter" further says:

The Government can not cope with the present crises unless ments on the indemnity are soon forthcoming. * * * France "The Government can not cope with the present crises unless payments on the indemnity are soon forthcoming. * * * France has been less progressive in her tax legislation than England and the United States. She depends less upon the taxation of individuals and corporation incomes and more upon sales taxes and other obsolete methods of collecting revenue."

In cable March 27 (Washington Post) it says of the French economic crists:

nomic crisis:

"This, it is asserted here, is not due to overproduction but instead to willful underconsumption as a result of prevailing high prices, which are likely to continue."

HIGH PRICES, UNDERCONSUMPTION, AND DISTRESS FOLLOW THE SALES TAX

The above contains a clean-cut survey of the experience of the

The above contains a clean-cut survey of the experience of the only large country which has adopted a turnover sales tax. The Philippine sales tax offers no solution. Receipts in 1919 were $6,865,624 (₱13,731,248) and in 1920 $7,521,000 (₱15,042,000) collected from 10,500,000 people, or about 75 cents per capita. That rate is 1 per cent. (Sec. 1459 P. I.)

The Smoot rate of 1 per cent would bring 75 cents per capita, or about $75,000,000, in this country at same proportionate consumption. It is useless to speculate how much more we would consume. These are the figures. As well compare a skiff on a mill pond or on a large lake subject to heavy winds and waves as to compare the Philippines with a nominal budget and ours with $4,000,000,000 annually.

Canada's sales tax is not a sales tax and has proven a notorious revenue disappointment, filled with exemptions, administered by a body possessing practically legislative functions, to change or add further exemptions.

Mr. McCoy, the Treasury expert, I am informed, estimated $185,000,000 annually on our luxury taxes, whereas only about $50,000,000 has been collected, or less than one-third of the estimates. This is a final sales tax and speaks for itself.

Here is the San Francisco Chronicle; I have no criticism, but it publishes a full-page advertisement on the sales tax by the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Baltimore. It was also published here in the city of Washington and presumably published generally throughout the United States. Who pays the enormous amount of money to finance this one advertisement, and what was the purpose? The public is entitled to know. Who pays for the lobby that is to be established here in Washington? Who is paying for all this large expenditure of money, and who is instigating the work?

I have here an original letter from one of the men who apwork?

I have here an original letter from one of the men who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means. His name is Jules S. Bache, of New York City. His letter is dated March 28, two weeks ago. It went all over the country. Thousands of copies, I understand, have been circulated among financial interests that, in the aggregate, have $1,000,000,000 annual excessprofits tax and income tax at stake that is to be shifted to a sales

DEAR SIR: It is stated that business men in this country are paying out in fees for expert services in the preparation of their income-tax returns about $100,000,000 annually. * * *

The Government does not receive any part of this vast sum nor does it receive the hundreds of millions which for one reason or another are never collected under the present inadequate and bunglesome tax system.

simplify and improve the present system a tax on all gro sales is proposed. Such a tax is easily collected, and this is a big thing in its favor. Clearly a sales tax would be inexpensive in its operation and no burden to anyone, and would fairly and equitably spread the obligation of Government expense to all in the fair and just proportion each should bear. Moreover, it will be simple in operation and will return a sufficient revenue. I am writing to you because men like you and me may, as well as anyone else, take up the fight for an adequate taxing system. It is our job since it is our money which is now being taken inequitably from us under a system which constitutes, undoubtedly the greatest blight upon legitimate business initiative now existing.

I ask your cooperation in a plan now organizing to conduct an educational campaign in favor of a general sales or turnover tax educational campaign in favor of a general sales of turnover tax throughout the country.

For this purpose the Tax League of America has been created and has already done work which is showing results. Will you, therefore, please send your check for $50 payable to Jules S. Bache, treasurer, and mail same to the Tax League of America (Inc.), 1270 Broadway, New York City?

Yours very truly,

JULES S. BACHE.

(First vice president, John Williams, New York; vice president Irving National Bank.)

Mr. Bache, from his testimony before our committee, has presumably contributed twenty or fifty times $50. His taxes make the stake worth while.

How many thousands of these letters are being circulated throughout the country, and what is to be done with the enormous sum of money which will be raised? Mr. Bache was before our committee. He stated he is investing as fast as possible all our committee. He stated he is investing as fast as possible all his money in municipal bonds in order to escape taxation. He stated to the industrial tax committee that the average man spends 11 months of the year trying to legally evade his taxes. He said at the same time the way to escape consumption taxation under his proposition is not to consume. This is the gentleman who is going to crack the whip over the Congress of the United States. His lobby will be working full force in a few days, and then we will be given the benefit of his many publicity agencies in earnest. in earnest.

From the New York Times, several days ago, I quote:

35,000 JEWELERS' LETTERS $27,000

I quote from page 91 of the Jewelers' Circular, April 13, 1921, a public statement of Chairman Larter, of the "Jewelers' Committee," known as "the governor of the jewelry industry." He said:

Do you know that the jewelers' vigilance committee has paid "Do you know that the jewelers' vigilance committee has paid the jewelry trade's share of the expenses of the business men's tax committee, and this amount up to date for tax matters is in excess of $27,000? About the 1st of January we sent over 35,000 letters to every jeweler in the United States, asking them to write their Congressmen and Senators in favor of the turnover sales tax and to send us contributions. Recently we selected 26 cities in the United States and prorated the amount we thought each city should contribute." Candy men, jewelers, retailers, druggists, stock brokers, newspapers are all on the job.

Here they are dividing the United States up into 26 districts to get money in behalf of their organization to help put over the sales tax. I received yesterday a New York paper in which it says some New York man claiming to represent the traveling says some New York man claiming to represent the traveling salesmen says of the sales tax opposition:

"That a powerful group of large tax accountants and experts were banded together to defeat the sales tax because it would wipe out the need of their services, for which $100,000,000 a year is now paid."

This sounds so much like Mr. Bache's letter that further comment as to its source is unnecessary. They are trying to find the $100,000,000 accountants, and we ought to have them testify where they exist. Let us have the facts.

Many editorials and news items are being received supporting a sales tax. What will the effect of the excess-profits tax be on the newspapers, the great newspapers, the powerful newspapers of the country? I do not criticize them, but I am speaking of their interests in the subject, for the interest of every witness should be known to the jury. What is the effect of a profits tax on the great newspapers, what do they now pay, and what will be the effect of a sales tax and what difference will it make when advertising contracts go free? We understand the tremendous power they exercise to-day. They have a right to protect their interests, but what are those interests? Both of these gentlemen—Mr. Bache and Mr. Rothschild—speak of the educational campaigns they are now carrying on in all congressional districts. That same kind of education was carried on by a notorious body of New Yorkers known as the National Security League. We made an investigation of that organization in Congress. What was the result? A discovery of $600,000 or more for an educational fund Many editorials and news items are being received supporting result? A discovery of $600,000 or more for an educational fund which was used as a slush fund to aid in the defeat of Members of Congress.

What part of this Bache and Rothschild fund is a slush fund? One of the leading men on the Democratic side, a man of high character, stated to me that the amount of the sales-tax contributions would be a million dollars. That was at the close of the last session, before he knew of the many agencies and funds and lobbies that are being organized.

The Charman (Mr. Reavis). The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. Frear. May I have 15 additional minutes?
Mr. Kindred. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman may have additional time

Mr. Young. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.
Mr. Frear. I am asking for an investigation in order to stop this tremendous propaganda, or in order to permit Members of Congress to decide these questions upon their own merits and not upon the representations of men who are demanding we shift a billion dollars in taxes from them over to the backs of the 100,000,000 who can not escape. I have received probably 600 letters demanding a sales tax. How many have you Members received? All the letters received from this propaganda are on one ceived? All the letters received from this propaganda are on one side, practically, with not 10 letters to the contrary, whereas the sentiment of the country is just the reverse. One million men want to escape excess-profits taxes and are trying to shift their taxes onto the remaining 105,000,000 through a sales tax. To pyramid the costs of living for every man with a family of five to from $100 to $200 or more annually. What will these people say if we pass a sales tax?

I have here a letter received last night from my home city, sent out by the Rothschild organization. It says that there is going to be raised $4,000,000,000 by the 1 per cent sales tax. What a dishonest and false statement to make. Every district is to be flooded with letters, my friends, and I ask for an investigation. I do not think Congress ought to sit mute when these matters are pressed upon the country by irresponsible "incorporated" concerns, and that is a reason why there should be an investigation.

I am not going to discuss the sales tax now. I did so in my speech of January 31. I want you to understand the propaganda on this revenue sales tax bill financed by the man who has the money, the excess profits, and who is trying to shove his taxes onto the poor people of the country. He should pay according to his ability to pay, a principle that has stood for generations and is supported by the organizations quoted against a sales tax. The best tax experts in the country insist on that principle. Why not? Why should every dollar's worth of necessities a poor man buys, his coffee and tea and sugar and clothes, be taxed to relieve the men who will pay nearly a billion dollars in excessprofits taxes in 1921 after deducting their $3,000 exemption and 8 per cent on their invested capital, which is now exempt? The United States Steel Corporation the other day reported that it made 43 per cent more in 1920 than it made in 1919, or $109,000,000,000 profit. Texas Oil the other day reported a profit of $85,000,000, I am not going to discuss the sales tax now. I did so in my 000 profit. Texas Oil the other day reported a profit of $85,000,000, and it made 56 per cent more in 1920 than in 1919. Are you going to relieve those people from that excess-profits tax? I can not believe it possible, unless some equally just tax is to be substituted. I have here an editorial from the Wall Street Journal, of over a column, criticizing me because I made a speech here against the sales tax on January 31.

I delivered the speech and sent it out, because I am thoroughly opposed to a turnover sales tax to run the Government. I wish other Members who are better able to do so would undertake the task of presenting opposition, because it calls for action and because, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good] sald on this floor, any party that undertakes to put a sales tax through will be defeated the next time at the polls. I fear he is right. The editorial was unjust, made many misstatements, and failed to mention facts that could not have escaped the attention of any fair-minded writer. My answer says:

EDITOR WALL STREET JOURNAL, "New York City, N. Y.

"My Dear Sir: Your column editorial in the Wall Street Journal of April 5 is received, wherein I am chastised editorially by B. S. Orcutt because in my speech of January 31 I opposed a sales tax and because I recently stated: 'All sales-tax people desire to force that tax on the people before it can fully be understood.' That statement I repeat, while the Journal confesses its truth and avoids by saying an 'educational' propaganda demanding a sales tax is now on. A strong tax propaganda has been on for months, although it misrepresents, misstates, and theorizes without basis although it misrepresents, misstates, and theorizes without basis or reason. Members have been deluged with sales-tax letters urging a discredited tax, generally abandoned centuries ago by civilized governments. I have received 500 letters, including 145 from candy makers alone, all demanding to be exempted from taxes they now pay and also demanding that Congress substitute a sales tax. This kind of 'education' is admitted.

"A powerful lobby with an enormous slush fund is planned in Washington to push the sales tax through Congress.

"Is that the 'educational' medium to which you refer? Highly paid publicity men and men who crack the whip in Wall Street are about to crack their whips over Congress, according to this propagation.

about to crack their whips over Congress, according to this propa-ganda, in an effort to shift $1,000,000,000 in taxes they now pay annually over to the backs of the hundred million men, women, and children of the country who consume. These millions have no lobby, but they are to be sales-taxed over a billion dollars on everything they eat, drink, and wear, so that Wall Street profits may go untaxed or may be undertaxed. This lobby includes scores of men now taxed who are expected to appear before the Senate committee to voice their woes, while the sales-tax lobby is as boastful and brutal as the National Security League of like membership and fame, that blew up when its $600,000 'educational' slush fund and Wall Street methods were exposed by Congress.

"The Wall Street Journal is recognized as a leader in this present sales-tax propaganda, for apart from its editorials the Journal printed a full-page 'advertisement' on March 17, page 7, demanding a sales tax-

I referred to a page advertisement in the Wall Street Journal that favored a sales tax—

"Therein this advertisement said of the recently enacted French sales tax: 'The yield is already proving unexpectedly satisfactory and there appears to be every reason that it will produce a much greater amount than had been anticipated in the budget estimates.

"The Wall Street Journal carried that false statement through-"The Wall Street Journal carried that false statement throughout the country on March 17, although long prior to that date the New York press printed the fact that French budget estimates of January and February, 1921, were 487,000,000 francs and 413,000,000 francs, respectively, yet the actual receipts by the French Government for the same months had only been 187,000,000 francs and 151,000,000 francs, in round numbers, or a little over one-third of the estimates. At present values this reached only $11,000,000 monthly for France, or less than 10 per cent of what is predicted here. In other words, the Journal was 63 per cent wrong on the most important statement in its full-page advertisement of March 17. advertisement of March 17.

"No greater injustice could be done Congress than to send broadcast this glaring misstatement of the most important fact on which a sales-tax law was to be based. Was it a mistake on your part?

"Your Orcutt editorial of April 5 pretends to explain why a packed sales-tax crowd led by Bache and Rothschild, tax leaders, failed to capture a meeting of the National Industrial Tax Conference which had previously denounced a sales tax.

"The National Industrial Conference Tax Committee represented thousands of great industries, billions of dollars in the aggregate, and millions of laboring men employed, whereas Bache and Rothschild are New York stock brokers or jewelers. That committee squarely rejected the sales tax. Its authority was limited to its report, but you complain because a handful of Wall Street tax dodgers failed to capture the meeting. That is the burden of your editorial. Three members there present state your editorial criticism is a misstatement of fact." criticism is a misstatement of fact.'

Three members of that committee in my office all said that I had stated the facts correctly in the speech of January 31, and that there was no correction they had to make. And let me say this, that all men of great means are not in favor of a sales tax. this, that all men of great means are not in favor of a sales tax. Mr. R. P. Hazzard, who is at the head of the Hazzard Shoe Co., said in my office two or three days ago, "Mr. Frear, it would be $200,000 more a year interest to me to have the sales-tax provision passed, and yet I have been opposing it at every place I could, speaking against it constantly." Mr. Hazzard realizes, as he says, not only the injustice of putting this enormous tax burden upon the shoulders of the people, but beyond that comes the question of destroying many small companies that compete with his big company and other integrated concerns where he and they would have a great advantage through a turnover sales tax.

I am continuing to read from my letter to the Wall Street Journal:

"Your deliberate nurses to mister the sale tax.

"Your deliberate purpose to mislead and deceive is again emphasized. The contributor of your editorial, Mr. Orcutt, had an intimate knowledge of the tax meeting referred to and of my speech. That you admit. He knew that I quoted in my speech of January 31 at length from official reports of two important committees, the national industrial tax committee and the United States Chamber of Commerce tax committee. Both committee repudiated any sales tax. Why did you not state in your editorial that the tax committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce, representing hundreds of thousands of business men of the country, not only reported unqualifiedly against any sales tax, but on February 21 reported on a referendum to the chambers of America, which was widely published in the press? Why did you America, which was widely published in the press? Why did you not state that in this referendum 1,221½ votes favored an excise tax but opposed its imposition on articles of first necessity, with only 504½ votes opposed, contrary to the Journal's position? On the referendum of Should a sales tax be substituted for an excessthe referendum of Should a sales tax be substituted for an excess-profits tax and excise tax? the vote was 706½ for and 857½ against, or a majority of 151 unit votes against. On the referen-dum of Should a sales tax be levied in addition to excess profits and excise? the vote was 767½ for and 894½ against, or 127 ma-jority unit votes against. Why did you not give the facts where hundreds of thousands of business men were represented, as by these organizations, distinguished from a handful of Wall Street sales-tax boosters, whose money and publicity is their capital in trade?

"What more significant evidence of deliberate concealment of facts and of misstatement could be afforded than your unfair reference to one committee and concealment of the other? What effect does the excess-profits tax have on the advertising profits of your paper and of all the other large papers? Will you escape many thousands of dollars tax annually under a general sales tax law?"

ONE HUNDRED MILLION PEOPLE AGAINST A SALES TAX

"What do you honestly believe, Mr. Editor, is the sentiment of the 10,000,000 farmers and an equal number of laborers on whose backs the Wall Street Journal and its bulls and bears are trying to shift a billion-dollar tax burden now paid by the rich out of their profits? What is the sentiment of the millions upon millions of women and children who have no powerful lobby, no Wall Street Journal, no great slush fund, and no wide propaganda, but who confidently depend on Congress to protect them ganda, but who condently depend on Congress to protect them now and always? Is their opinion to be ignored?

"What answer do you make, Mr. Editor, to the statement of Chairman Good, of the Appropriations Committee of the House, that 'a sales tax is a tax on the backs and bellies of the people, and any party passing such a law is certain to go down to defeat '? Yet you approve that iniquitous tax.

"The country knows those you represent are less than for "The country knows those you represent are less than 5 per cent of the American people, men whose politics and principles are measured by personal interest or by the dollar mark, and many of them regard millions of jobless and of God's patient poor with unconcern or worse. Business interests such as you represent sent a great political party down to defeat eight years ago by use of money and the same tactics you now pursue.

"Do you not believe men responsible for placing a sales-tax burden on the people will be remembered for their action, even as those who burdened the people with the 1909 tariff bill, and do you not believe this effort of greed and extortion on the part of those who have profiteered in the past and who now lead the sales-tax effort in putting screws on the people is unjust?

"Do you believe it is fair for the Journal to open on a humble Member of Congress with over a column editorial of misstate-ment and concealment in a cuttle-fish effort to obscure the issue? If you do not—and I assume you have an element of fairness that the advertising pages affected by existing excess-profits tax laws can not control—will you please give publicity to this needed correction of your editorial equal to that given your manifestly untrue editorial of April 5?

"Very truly yours,

"Lawre A Force."

" JAMES A. FREAR."

Mr. Chairman, the other day I sent to the Members of the House my speech of January 31. I did it simply because you, like myself, have received some 600 letters with little to the contrary. All I wish to do is to bring this before your attention, and as long as I sit in Congress I shall try to bring to your attention propaganda presented only on the one side when the people back home have had no voice on the other side. No case as flagrant has occurred in years as this sales-tax lobby and sales-tax propaganda.

Mr. Connally of Texas. If the excess-profits tax is to be repealed what is the gentleman's idea as to how revenue shall be pealed, what is the gentleman's idea as to how revenue shall be raised?

Mr. FREAR. One way in part is the bill of the gentleman from Mr. Freek. One way in part is the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Longworth], which is a good one, supported by Mr. Houston, of the Treasury Department, to put 6 per cent additional to the 10 per cent on the net profits of corporations, which will raise about $450,000,000 according to their estimates. Rather than have a sales tax, I am willing to accept practically anything. than have a sales tax, I am willing to accept practically anything. Next, we might put a tax on undistributed profits, if necessary, which will raise about $190,000,000 by the tax proper, according to Treasury estimates, and would realize about $400,000,000 more according to the statement of the Treasury experts at that time, or nearly $600,000,000 or over a billion dollars by those two items of revenue alone, in addition to nearly a billion dollars excess under present revenues for 1921, according to estimates.

Mr. Connally of Texas. The gentleman recalls the statement in the President's message the other day that you gentlemen were committed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. Freas. I heard the President's statement. I have no issue to join with him. I do not care to have any political issue raised about this. Let me say this, if you gentlemen are sincere and honest in this thing, regarding your opposition to a sales tax, come and help us now to let Congress and the country know what come and help us now to let congress and the country and what efforts are being made to put through a sales tax. Do not wait until we do something on this side of the aisle and then complain about it. Why did you not pass a resolution against a sales tax yesterday in your caucus? Then was the time to help those of us who feel the same way about it, for I know many of you are opposed to that kind of a tax.

opposed to that kind of a tax.

Mr. Garner. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Frear. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. Garner. Does the gentleman favor the taxes he has just suggested instead of the excess-profits tax?

Mr. FREAR, I would favor any of them by far in preference to a

Mr. Garner. I did not ask the gentleman that. I ask the gentleman personally whether he favors those taxes that he has enutleman personally whether he favors those taxes that he has enumerated instead of the excess-profits tax?

Mr. Freer. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that, because the experts in the Treasury Department say there is no tax more fair than the excess-profits tax. I believe the men who are able to pay the taxes should pay them, and there is no one better able to pay than those who make excess profits.

Mr. Bankhead. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Freer. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. Bankhead. Does the gentleman think there is any serious danger of his party imposing a sales tax as a revenue scheme?

Mr. Freer. Oh, I wish I could tell the gentleman some things that I believe but do not know and that I can not speak of here. [Laughter.] Let me say that they are not of a political character, but I do know the situation, and the serious menace of a sales tax, and you know what is being done as well as I do in regard to it, because I have laid before you some of the data in my possession.

in my possession.

Mr. Longworth. Let me suggest that a very large portion of the amount that would be lost by the repeal of the excess-profits tax will be raised at the customhouse under a bill which I trust will be raised at the customnouse under a bill which I trust will be shortly reported to the House.

Mr. Frear. A good suggestion coming from the gentleman from Ohio—three hundred millions is an item of additional income which will be received from the customhouse under the new tariff bill, according to Treasury estimates. We also have proposals that will raise about $2,500,000,000, so no possible excuse exists in my judgment for nutting through a sales tax. I thank exists, in my judgment, for putting through a sales tax. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have submitted with these remarks some observations on a turnover sales tax, that is not particularly involved in the bill before us, but it discloses from the lips of able tax experts that a manufacturers' tax which enables the manufacturer, jobber, wholesaler, and retailer to take his profits and a little extra, if need be, is equally objectionable when it fastens the tax upon the necessities of the consumer, rich and poor alike with certainty that the poor will pay far more proportionately than his rich neighbor who is endeavoring to eventually secure a sales tax as a substitute for the present income tax.

The income tax law was only obtained by constant struggles by the people. It was first defeated by a Supreme Court decision of 5 to 4 that attempted, with assumed constitutional authority, to prevent the imposition of an income tax. The minority opinion of four members of the court was so conclusive in character that Congress immediately offered a constitutional amendment to secure amplified power under the Constitution to pass another income tax law. Based upon that amendment and law, again the tremendous pressure by great financial organizations was felt and the court divided again five to four on the stock dividend decision, which emasculated the law and in effect has weakened the income-tax provision of the Constitution.

All this is familiar history to tax students, but it has a bearing to show the tremendous power which is now being exercised by these same wealthy individuals and interests that have failed permanently to prevent the income tax being levied upon them and who now seek to substitute a sales tax on the theory that 21/4 per cent tax is so small that it will not create opposition, but the camel's nose under the tent will be pressed to a much higher extent, either by a larger rate, like the 6 per cent manufacturers' tax rate now in Australia, or by a turnover sales tax, if it can be successfully pressed on Congress as heretofore attempted.

Let me say frankly that is the avowed purpose of those now urging the tax, but I am sure it is in no way chargeable to some of those who are defending it at the present time. They have been captured by the pleasing cry of balancing the Budget, and instead of placing taxes where they belong-upon those best able to pay-they are flirting with a tax that once accepted and placed in the statute will be a Sinbad burden, only to be unloaded by some general revulsion of sentiment, political or otherwise, throughout the country.

On March 14, this week, I sent a letter to my colleagues of the House, of which the following is a copy:

> CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Washington, D. C., March 14, 1932.

Dear Colleague: Do we want a sales tax? A head tax or poll tax in its effect, it discards the principle of comparative income or ability to pay, but taxes consumption. In the RECORD of Friday, March 11 last, pages 5818 to 5836, is found quoted nearly a score of eminent tax experts and farm and labor organizations in this country and in Canada in opposition to a sales tax, taken from a former speech. Although then urged by the Treasury, that tax was defeated by the House committee—and other tax sources found.

vigorous opposition was expressed by these witnesses against alleged efforts to substitute a sales tax for income and other taxes. Arguments against the tax by labor and farm organizations and all others in 1921 apply especially in these days of business depression and unemployment when the people are demanding bread for relief instead of a stone.

None of these witnesses apparently were heard in the recent committee hearings. A manufacturers' tax with profits of jobbers, wholesalers, and retailers is usually passed on to the consumer. Ex-Senator Hardwick, Georgia, testified in 1920 before the committee that such increase, in cases cited, might reach 100 sumer. Ex-Senator Hardwick, Georgia, testified in 1920 before the committee that such increase, in cases cited, might reach 100 per cent over the original sales price. Witnesses in opposition to a sales tax will also be found in my speeches of January 31, December 21, and April 14, all in 1921, and February 21 in 1922. The Canadian sales tax produced $38,000,000 in 1920-21, $100,000,000 in 1923-24, and only $20,000,000 in 1930-31. (Hearings, p. 249.) Change in character and rates should be studied, when Engand land, though badly depressed, has steadily refused to follow her two colonies with this unjust tax that carries a rate of 4 per cent in Canada and 6 per cent in Australia, rates later to be urged on Congress by strong influences.

Congress by strong influences.

No substitute taxes need be suggested. The gift tax on $50,000 is only started at 1½ per cent. The estate tax should not remit 80 per cent for State credits. Increased tax is justified on cigarettes, now costing three times as much in Canada. (Hearings, p. 246.) Tax on gasoline of 1 cent and on car and truck sales, with other items, will be more just to 95 per cent of America's consumers than a sales tax.

If as predicted by the press this $600,000.

If, as predicted by the press, this $600,000,000 consumption tax remains in the House bill, the Senate may substitute some other tax for one which England rejects and all tax experts I have quoted declare is against correct principles of taxation—a tax on necessities that will increase the prevailing distress and discontent.

Very truly yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

Mr. Speaker, although the time is too limited to obtain any extended statements from organizations that militantly opposed the sales tax when last sought to be fastened upon consumers, I offer the opinion of leading officials of the American Federation of Labor, appearing a few days ago in the following statement:

[From the American Federation of Labor official information service |

issued the following statement to-day regarding the proposed sales tax now being considered by Congress:

"The sales-tax provision of the pending taxation legislation is strongly opposed by the American Federation of Labor. This position of the American Federation of Labor is based upon its position of the American Federation of Labor is based upon its traditional opposition to all forms of sales-tax legislation. Whatever argument is offered in support of sales-tax legislation during periods of reasonable prosperity can not apply now. The existing economic situation adds to the strength of argument against the imposition of such a character of taxation. The sales tax would fall more heavily upon the masses of the people who are now suffering from unemployment than upon any other group of our citizenship. To add a sales tax to the reductions of wages which have been imposed upon wage earners during the last year would mean addition to the misery, woe, and want which now prevail throughout the land.

"How can men and women who are unable to buy the bare necessities of life be expected to pay a sales tax upon the limited merchandise which they are able to buy? This proposed manufacturers' sales tax will affect the sale of clothes, shoes, and a large percentage of foodstuffs. To impose this sales tax upon these necessities of life would mean that the masses, who are now purchasing only a limited amount, would be compelled to buy still It is a form of taxation which is contrary to the basis upon which we have always built our tax structure, namely, to relieve those who are least able and collect from those who are best able to pay.

"The Democratic convention, held in 1924, adopted the following declaration: 'We oppose the so-called nuisance taxes, sales taxes, and all other forms of taxation that unfairly shift to the consumer the burdens of taxation.' So far as the record shows this position, assumed by the Democratic convention in 1924, has never been changed or modified. In the light of this declaration, it is now difficult to understand how and why the majority party in Congress should favor this character of legislation.

"The membership of organized labor holds that the burden of taxation must be equitably distributed upon all classes of people. taxation must be equitably distributed upon all classes of people. The sales tax violates this sound principle because, in operation, it imposes a burden upon those who are unable to bear it. Such a tax as the proposed sales tax will tend to delay a return to prosperity. It will further destroy the very limited buying power now possessed by the masses of the people. It will prevent the sale of manufactured goods and it will mean less food, warmth, and clothing for millions of men, women, and children. Labor will call upon its friends in Congress to defeat that section of the taxation measure which provides for a sales tax."

Here is advice from the National Grange, Washington, D. C., March 17, 1932:

Hon. James A. Frear,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.
DEAR MR. FREAR: Replying to your letter of recent date, I note what you have to say regarding that feature of the new revenue bill relating to the sales-tax proposal. If the proposed sales tax should be enacted, according to my advice it would cost the 6,000,000 farm families of America at least $300,000,000 a year due to pyramiding.

In answer to your question as to whether the Grange would still oppose the imposition of a sales tax if canned goods were exempted, I beg to say with emphasis that we would still be

against it.

As the Washington representative of the Grange, I was one of the first witnesses to appear before the Ways and Means Committee in connection with the hearings on the revenue bill. I told the members of the committee that we were opposed to a sales tax, because it was a tax on the necessities of the people and ignored the principle of ability to pay.

It was not until shortly before the bill appeared that we began to hear rumors that the committee was seriously considering a general sales tax. We had no definite knowledge on the subject. If the bill passes the House with the sales-tax proposal included, we shall, of course, fight it in the Senate. However, we hope that the provisions for a sales tax may be stricken from the bill in the House. Otherwise, even if it should be defeated in the Senate, complications might ensue in conference.

complications might ensue in conference.

I am convinced that if this legislation could be held up long enough to get the reaction of the people back home, the sales tax would not pass. In view of the condition of the rank and file of the people throughout the country, the proposal for a sales tax is nothing short of a legislative monstrosity. It should be killed and buried beyond hope of resurrection.

I am inclosing herewith a copy of a letter on the subject which has been sent to all Members of Congress.

Sincerely yours,

FRED BRENCKMAN, Washington Representative.

THE NATIONAL GRANGE, Washington, D. C., March 15, 1932.

To the Members of Congress:

We recognize the unpleasant duty with which Congress is con-fronted in framing legislation to balance the Federal Budget, but we desire to register an emphatic protest against that feature of the new revenue bill which calls for the imposition of a sales tax.

It is conceded that there are approximately 8,000,000 unemployed people in the United States at this time. Adding their dependents it would probably be conservative to say that 25,000,000 people are without any income to-day and many of them are subsisting upon charity. The disproportionate burdens of taxation sisting upon charity. The disproportionate burdens of taxation which have been placed upon agriculture, together with the collapse of prices received for farm products, have worked the virtual ruin of our farmers. Combining the unemployed in our industrial centers with the agricultural population gives us a total of more than 50,000,000 people whose purchasing power has been greatly impaired or wholly destroyed.

Further than that, on December 7, 1931, in response to a request for information from a Member of Congress, the then Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, stated that there were unpaid taxes due the Government and pending on appeal amounting to almost a billion dollars. These taxes are due principally for 1929 and previous years. Speeding up adjustments and collections in these cases would bring hundreds of millions of dollars into the Federal Treasury and would, to that extent, obviate the necessity for imposing new taxes.

rederal Treasury and would, to that extent, obviate the necessity for imposing new taxes.

The imposition of a general sales tax would meet with the unqualified disapproval of the 27,000,000 people upon the farms of this country. The effects of such a tax under prevailing conditions would not only be oppressive but would delay the return of prosperity, and could not be justified.

Yours respectfully,

The National Geange

THE NATIONAL GRANGE, FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative. This word is from the Farmers Union:

THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND Cooperative Union of America, Washington, D. C., March 16, 1932.

Hon. James A. Frear

United States Representative, Washington, D. C.

Dear Congressman: I sent telegrams to every State headquarters of the Farmers' Union about a week ago asking them to have their members to send telegrams and write letters to their respective Congressmen and Senators asking them to oppose the sales tax.

Yours truly.

JOHN A. SIMPSON. President.

This is a brief that speaks for itself about Canadian taxes.

MEMO FROM BRIEF PREPARED BY CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION-TAXTION

It seems inevitable that the basis of taxation must be broadened, i. e., more people will have to pay taxes according to their ability.

Last year a special committee of the Canadian Manufacturers'

Association, in cooperation with other organizations, investigated Association, in cooperation with other organizations, investigated the problems of taxation, not only in Canada but also in the United States, Great Britain, France, and other countries. This committee submitted the following recommendations to the Dominion Government:

(a) That the business profits war tax shall not be reenacted.

(b) That the income war tax act as regards corporations shall be repealed.

That the present sales tax shall be adjusted so as to provide (c)

the additional revenue needed by the Dominion Government.

At the last session of Parliament the business profits war tax act was not reenacted; the sales tax was readjusted so as to provide additional revenue, but the income war tax act as regards corporations was not changed.

As we believe that the general policy outlined in these proposals is sound, we respectfully beg to submit the following similar representations to the present Government of Canada in the hope that Parliament will see fit to act favorably on them at the coming session:

(a) That duplication of taxation be avoided as much as possible.

(b) That the income war tax act as regards corporations shall

(b) That the income war tax act as regards corporations shall be repealed.

(c) That the present sales tax shall be adjusted so as to provide additional revenue.

In considering (a) and (b) attention is drawn to the case of a company operating in all the nine Provinces of Canada. This company is taxed by the Dominion Government; it is taxed by each of all cases as a corporation, its shareholders are also taxed by the Dominion, provincial and municipal government on property, business, dividends, and income.

We submit that the Dominion Government should make an arrangement with the provincial governments, whereby this duplication would be, in part at least, avoided.

In regard to the sales tax we beg to advocate:

"That as the sales tax is a tax payable by the purchaser, manufacturers and wholesalers should not be held liable for any taxes which they can not collect owing to the purchaser becoming inwhich they can not collect owing to the purchaser becoming insolvent or refusing to pay, even though the manufacturer or wholesaler has in the meantime advanced the amount of the tax to the Government when making his monthly returns."

Mr. Speaker, here is a novel provision, that a taxpayer, whose business it is to collect his tax before delivery of goods to the wholesaler, is to be exempt from taxes passed on to the consumer after the wholesaler fails to pay for the goods. It is one of the inconsistencies that makes a sales tax unjust and objectionable.

The foregoing remarks are submitted, and without summing up let me say that, without reflection upon the committee's report, the sales-tax feature based on the hearings is not supported by any witness except as to painless administration by some official.

The policy was not approved for a temporary or permanent tax.

The reports contained in speeches oppose unanimously a consumers' tax, because a tax on necessities. For these reasons I submit the manufacturers' sales tax should be stricken from the bill.

Here is a last letter just received:

THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND Cooperative Union of America, Washington, D. C., March 17, 1932.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,

United States Representative, Washington, D. C.

Dear Congressman: The Grange, the Farm Bureau, and the Farmers' Union all testified before the Ways and Means Committee against a sales tax. We are against it now. Our members all over the United States are writing their Congressmen and Senators and sending them telegrams saying they are against the sales'

I do not know whether Canadian farm organizations favor a sales tax or not. I would gamble a little that they do not favor it. We three farm organizations did not believe a sales tax was being seriously considered by the Ways and Means Committee. We shall certainly go before the Senate committee if the House passes the tax bill with the sales tax in it.

We, the farmers, feel that for three months Congress has been passing large quantities of candy out to the big bankers, rallpassing large quantities of candy out to the big bankers, railroads, and other big business without any of it getting to the farmers. We consider that we have been rankly discriminated against in the blessings bestowed by the Government. But we are amazed to find that when there is a load to carry the burden is shoved onto our backs.

I predict there are more voters in the Nation watching this sales tax than any one measure that has arisen in Congress since the World War.

Yours truly,

JOHN A. SIMPSON, President.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

REPORT OF THE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE

Mr. GLASS, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported favorably the nomination of Vulosko Vaiden, of Farmville, Va., to be a member of the Federal Farm Loan Board, for the unexpired term of eight years expiring August 6, 1932, in place of George R. Cooksey, resigned, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

CUSTOMS SERVICE-FRED A. BRADLEY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Fred A. Bradley to be collector, customs collection district No. 9, Buffalo, N. Y.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination? The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I realize that this is a controversial question. It may be that Senators will wish to ask about one point or another as the points are developed. However, I would prefer, if I may, to complete my statement, and then if there are any questions in mind that need to be answered, I shall be happy to make such reply as I can.

Mr. President, when it became known that the President had sent to the Senate the name of Fred A. Bradley for reappointment as collector of customs at Buffalo, I had floods of letters asking that the office be investigated. After the committee reported, assuming such investigation had actually been made, I asked the Senate to defer action on the pending confirmation. I did this so I might be able to say to my constituents that from my own knowledge proper investigation had been made.

I found, to my regret, that pressure of other matters had made it impossible for the Finance Committee to go into details. The reports and papers accompanying the hearings had not been examined. This is apparent, because careful study reveals that contained in them are matters of vital importance to the formation of an accurate conclusion.

It is not surprising that the committee was misled by the testimony of some witnesses. Unfortunately some of the testimony was based on hearsay, some on bad memory, and some possibly on the desire to deceive. In any event, the committee's decision was not conclusive, and to one who studies the record it is far from convincing.

I say this with no desire to reflect in the least on the fair-minded and able Senators who conducted the hearings.

Furthermore. I have had access to much more official material than the committee had at its disposal. The committee had merely a few reports. I have had these files, 5 or 6 inches high, from the Treasury, State, and Justice Departments. They give in detail information as to matters which, in my opinion, should have been considered by the committee in forming judgment in the case. So, I repeat, I had the benefit of much more official material than the committee had at its disposal. In view of this additional testimony it is my intention to ask the Senate to recommit the nomination.

I am aware that this action is rarely taken, and then only on the presentation of abundant reasons. It is my desire to say no more than enough to induce the Senate to recommit. I do not care to say more, because there can be no conclusive decision without the taking of certain testimony under oath.

I want to speak about that for a moment. When the public was advised that there was to be a hearing, all those persons who had an interest in the matter were notified. But at the end of the letter of invitation—and I have copies of it here from the files of the committee-while it was stated that anyone wishing to be heard by the subcommittee should be present at the meeting, it was also stated:

The committee is not authorized to pay any expenses of witnesses attending the meeting.

So that, as a matter of fact, there came here only two witnesses from Buffalo, because the 60 or 70 other witnesses who could have given evidence were not so financially situated that they could take the trip from Buffalo to Washington.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York announced that he preferred not to be interrupted until he had concluded.

Mr. KING. I merely want to ask the Senator what witnesses from Buffalo he refers to as being 60 or 70 in number?

Mr. COPELAND. Witnesses conversant with the charges made against Mr. Bradley as to his various alleged acts of official dereliction.

But, as I have stated, I desire to say no more than enough to induce the Senate to recommit the nomination; I do not care to say more, because no one can form an accurate conclusion without the presence of the witnesses and their testimony being taken under oath.

The leads are here, but without the application of the powers of subpæna complete determination of the truth is impossible.

This is a complicated case. It is amazing how far the leads go. They reach into Canada and every part of west-ern New York, but they do not stop there. They go to Albany, they come to Washington.

It has been charged against Bradley-the present collector of customs at Buffalo-that he consorts with bootleggers, profits by the admission of contraband, and shuts his eyes to violations of the customs laws. In short, it is alleged he conspires against the welfare of his country and is a party to the undermining of law and order.

Every friend of Mr. Bradley and Mr. Bradley himself should welcome an investigation so genuine, so sweeping, so searching that when it is over, if this man is cleared of suspicion Bradley and his friends can rejoice and be glad. Personally I shall be glad if this is the result. I never saw the man, he never harmed me, and I hate to be the cause of a single bit of annoyance to him.

INCOMPLETE INVESTIGATIONS

But I should not be true to my oath of office nor to my constituents if I failed to present to the Senate a résumé of the official records relating to his administration of the collectorship. If I succeed in my efforts, the Senate will be amazed at the incompleteness of every investigation undertaken. Each one ended almost before it was begun. Certainly, there is no evidence that those evils of his administration which were found were ever removed or corrected.

minds of his superiors. The time and money spent in investigations were wasted. Bradley continues to hold office in spite of official criticism and private protest.

It was testified before the Senate committee by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that undercover men were sent to Buffalo; that unknown to Bradley they joined the customs patrol. The inference is that these men discovered nothing wrong with the office.

It took a long time to get the original records of this particular "investigation." On February 25 I wrote the Treasury for these and other material. A few days ago the papers were delivered to me. It is my belief I now have all the records relating to the Bradley case, except possibly some which relate to smuggling. I have not been able in my study of these records to find any report dealing with that particular allegation. These records are accessible to the Senate, but it will be no small task to sift them, to analyze and appraise them. Until that is done, however, and until proper witnesses are produced to verify or disprove certain matters, there can be no reliable estimate of the fitness of this nominee to be confirmed.

For my immediate purpose, I wish now to refer to the testimony of Secretary Lowman, as found on page 86 of the hearing of January 13, 1932. The subcommittee held two hearings, one on the 12th of January and the other on the 13th. Mr. Lowman appeared before the committee, and on page 86 of the hearings of January 13, 1932, appears this language by the Secretary, which I quote:

These reports of irregularities in Buffalo continued to come to the department. We sent undercover men there, without Bradley knowing it, or McCampbell or Rasmussen or any of them. They were in charge of E. J. Lewis, who is the Government customs agent in charge of all activities in Canada. He reported that everything was all regular. He said there was some smuggling un-doubtedly going on, but could find no connivance or anything

Again, on page 94, Governor Lowman said:

Why, Bradley knows now, but we had two men, two detectives, go and enlist in the patrol up there in Buffalo under Bradley without his knowledge or knowing anything of it. They joined the force, in other words.

I hope the Senate will bear in mind what Governor Lowman said, because he was so utterly mistaken, as will be seen later. I want the Senate also to bear in mind that in his testimony before the committee, by reason of a lapse of memory, he gave a wrong inference to the committee. I say that without prejudice to the governor; he is a friend of mine; I do not want to say anything to disparage him in the least, and I am giving the credit that he probably Apparently these two quotations from Mr. Lowman's testimony refer to an investigation made by Undercover Agents Geyer and Page, between October 23, 1929, and December 9, 1929. At least the official records which I have from the department show that these two men were assigned to the patrol, but not quite in the manner stated by Secretary Lowman. He is certainly mistaken in his belief that Bradley was ignorant of their presence.

As a matter of fact, the letter of Supervising Agent Lewis, copy attached herewith, Exhibit A, states specifically, "The collector requested this investigation."

Likewise, Exhibit B, a letter from Lewis, says:

It may be mentioned here that the collector requested the assignment of undercover men to his force.

In passing let me call attention to a statement in the letter. Exhibit A. I quote:

The second investigation resulted primarily from an investiga-tion by the immigration authorities of their patrol in which it was shown that several of their men were dishonest and indicated several customs men were also dishonest.

EVERY INVESTIGATION KNOWN TO COLLECTOR

It is apparent that nothing happens in the Buffalo district without the knowledge of the collector. But please accept no opinion of mine regarding this; depend on the Treasury record for the facts. In this connection, turn now to the I am not sure that their significance ever penetrated the report made by Customs Agents McAniff and Roberts. In a letter to Commissioner of Customs, Washington, dated involved. I can not help wondering if the Secretary of the at Buffalo, February 15, 1931, Exhibit C, page 3, I find this:

On or about October 1, 1929, Collector Bradley conferred with the supervising customs agent of his district relative to a request previously made by him to the bureau that he be furnished with undercover men to work on the United States customs border patrol with a view to developing information which had come to him of possible irregularities on said patrol.

The newspapers of Buffalo had been uncomfortably active in their comments on his administration. It was time for Bradley to give evidence of outraged virtue.

At this time-

McAniff and Roberts continue, page 4-

an arrangement was made to place two undercover men, C. E. Geyer and J. H. Page, both customs officers from other districts, on the patrol.

It will appear that Bradley knew all about this and-

On December 10, 1929, the supervising customs agent at Montreal forwarded to Collector Bradley the daily reports of Geyer and Page, and on December 29, 1929, a synopsis thereof.

Mr. NORRIS. Were they the undercover men?

Mr. COPELAND. They were the undercover men.

Secretary Lowman suffered from lapse of memory, or else his subordinates fooled him. In any event, Bradley was aware and fully informed of these alleged investigations. I say without fear of successful contradiction that no investigation of the office was ever made without full knowledge of the collector. Further, no one of the investigations was anything but an abortion. Indeed, the whole story of examinations into the Buffalo office is one of repeated miscarriages.

BREAKDOWN AT BUFFALO KNOWN IN WASHINGTON

The Washington authorities were not ignorant of the state of affairs in Buffalo. But they appeared to believe that the collector could be trusted to the limit. Every official sent to Buffalo conferred at once with Bradley. For instance, under date of October 5, 1929, Elmer J. Lewis, supervising customs agent, wrote to the Commissioner of Customs, Treasury Department, Washington. I quote from this letter:

I immediately proceeded to Buffalo, N. Y., and, in the absence of the collector, began work with the assistant collector.

On his return the collector got the facts.

Lewis knew that conditions were frightful. Mr. Lewis is the supervising customs man stationed at Montreal. His particular business is to watch over the border, to be sure that no contraband is admitted, and to check up on the customs patrol and men in the customs office to see that their duties are well performed. He tells of conferring with the district supervisor of immigration and his chief borderpatrol inspector. They advised that, although they had no evidence that would materially help, their investigation had shown that certain inspectors "were working with the bootleggers and smugglers, aiding them and receiving pay therefor and that they were the ringleaders corrupting each force.

Lewis writes to his superior in Washington, too:

There is no doubt but that the customs border patrol in Buffalo needs a most drastic investigation, lasting over a period of months.

DISHONEST BORDER PATROLMEN

I wish time permitted to give the Senate in great detail what these various "investigators" had to say about conditions up there. For example, in 1929, Geyer and Page found that a number of Bradley's border patrol made it a practice to steal Government gasoline, as well as seized liquor. This was reported to the collector-mind you, that was in 1929but, as late as 1931, to quote McAniff and Roberts, pages 16 and 17 of their report just referred to:

Bradley took no action on reports of derelictions of duty re-ported to him by Undercover Agents Geyer and Page, assigned at his own request, in the case of eight border-patrol inspectors.

These men who were stealing gasoline and otherwise operating in an indecent and immoral way.

Now, Mr. President, here is something to laugh over if it were not so condemnatory of the moral nature of the officials structions from the bureau.

Treasury ever read what follows. Charity leads me to believe he never did.

In this report which I have quoted, made in 1931, the customs agents-philosophers, surely-commented as follows about the thievery on the part of certain members of the patrol. I quote now from the report made to the Washington authorities:

With respect to the charges made by Geyer and Page, it is submitted that it is the experience of supervisory customs officials in Detroit, Ogdensburg, Buffalo, and elsewhere, in dealing with border-patrol problems that the dismissing of border-patrol inspectors, except in cases of serious infractions of the regulations, and the appointing of new men in their places, does not solve the problem of maintaining an effective border patrol of maintaining an effective border patrol.

It frequently happens that new men so employed are as bad or worse than those replaced.

The prime factors to be determined in considering derelictions of duty by patrol inspectors is whether or not the inspector is intrinsically honest and has the proper perception of his obligations to the Government, which may be developed by leadership and supervision.

They may steal gasoline and other articles from the Government, but if they are "intrinsically honest," then, under proper "leadership and supervision" it is quite all right to keep them!

But after this philosophical utterance they appear to have had a change of heart, because the report regarding the thievery continues as follows:

Having this in mind, it is submitted for the consideration of the department whether or not Mr. Bradley should not have taken some disciplinary action in these cases, and the effect his failure to do so had on the force of patrol inspectors serving under him.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL INVESTIGATES

The superficial and incomplete investigations of conditions at Buffalo are amazing. For example, Senator Borah wrote to the Department of Justice on April 1, 1930. In his letter the Senator said:

If the facts submitted are reliable-

The Senator called attention to letters he had had from persons in Buffalo about conditions. I am not sure but that he had affidavits; but, anyway, the affidavits are in existence. The Senator presented them to the Department of Justice with the letter which I am now quoting:

If the facts submitted are reliable, there is undoubtedly corruption and malfeasance generally in this office. * * * a grand jury investigation by a special prosecutor would reveal a very serious condition of affairs.

Five names were submitted by the Senator, and from these witnesses, the Senator suggested, the names of other witnesses might be secured.

In response to this letter, the Attorney General sent an investigator, D. O. Smith, to Buffalo, and the report is here-his own report. He arrived there, as his report shows, at 5.30 p. m. April 2, with instructions that his "report on this matter be mailed not later than the night of April 3, 1930."

Smith did well. During his one day he located two or three of his witnesses. His 5-page report, including the statement of a Niagara Falls witness, was mailed on April 3.

A couple of Senator Borah's proposed witnesses lived in Niagara Falls. Smith located some of the persons named. but apparently did not seek other witnesses, as suggested by the Senator. But Smith carried out instructions, sending to Washington a closely written typewritten report after his few hours in Buffalo. He got there the night of April 2 with the list of names submitted by the Senator from Idaho. Some of the witnesses lived in Niagara Falls. It takes an hour or an hour and a quarter to go from Buffalo to Niagara Falls, and another hour or hour and a quarter to return; but he was told to get his report in the next

I have the report here. It is a typewritten report of five closely single-spaced pages. It must have taken him all the afternoon to write that report; but he mailed it on the 3d. He was honest enough to admit the inadequacy of his report. because at the end he adds a line-

Further investigation of this matter is suspended pending in-

Alas! The investigation was suspended forever! Its only result was some sadly delayed official correspondence. Two months later the Attorney General wrote to Secretary Mellon about the Borah letter and Smith's investigation. Among other things he said:

An agent of this department interviewed the witness and his report and its exhibits indicate that the alleged misconduct of Bradley has heretofore been brought to the attention of your department. In that situation it is my view that our agents should not continue the investigation without a recommendation or statement from you upon the subject.

What did Mr. Mellon do? Surely he jumped at the chance to get the real facts about Buffalo. At last we are to have the truth!

But that is not what happened. Instead, the same deadly narcotic was applied. Here is the reply, signed by Mr. Mellon, although written by Governor Lowman, I assume.

Last night, in going over the testimony again, I found that Mr. Lowman did testify that he wrote the letter and handed it to Mr. Mellon for signature. This is found on page 89 of the record, if one should be interested enough to investigate it. Apparently, Governor Lowman had forgotten about his early feeling about Bradley—an apparently unfriendly feeling, which I shall demonstrate in a few moments from Mr. Lowman's own testimony—but this is what Governor Lowman prepared for Mr. Mellon to sign, which Mr. Mellon did sign, and the letter is in the record, which I have on my desk:

The department is having trouble from time to time in the Buffalo area, as well as elsewhere, through the baiting of customs patrolmen by bootleggers and smugglers. We have undercover men working in the Buffalo area frequently—

You know how they work. I have already demonstrated to you how those "frequent" visits of investigators worked—and a considerable number of customs officers have been detected in fraudulent practices and prosecuted. Mr. Bradley has been very active and helpful in this work.

God save the mark!

There is no doubt about Bradley's political activity-

I want to say just a word about that, although I am not raising that question. Mr. Bradley is not only collector of customs at Buffalo, but he is chairman of the Erie County political committee of his party. So he is collector of customs and also in charge of the activities of his party in Erie County, which includes Buffalo, so the Secretary says—but further than that the department has been unable to get any reliable evidence that would involve him in official shortcomings.

I do not know just what he meant by "further than that." I do not know whether he considered that being active in the party was a crime or not. Anyway, I am giving you the language as I find it.

Dismissed Government employees who have been connected with the liquor enforcement work and bootleggers are very free to circulate false information and charges against public officials.

The Bureau of Customs feels that the customs laws in the Buffalo area are being enforced as well as can be expected under present conditions and that the situation there, while difficult, is not bad. It is hoped that with closer cooperation on the part of the Canadian authorities that smuggling in this area will be very considerably curtailed in the near future.

And that was the end of another investigation.

BRADLEY AND THE "INVESTIGATORS"

Mind you, the charges, no matter who makes them, are directed against Bradley personally. But every investigator assigned to this area reports immediately to Bradley. As one report states, it would be "unethical" to act otherwise.

That is the quotation. It would be "unethical" not to tell Mr. Bradley that they were there investigating Bradley, I assume.

An example of this regularity of performance on the part of the officials is the following:

A "flying squadron" of two patrolmen from Vermont and three from Ogdensburg was sent into the Buffalo area. They operated during November and December, 1929. These men were to check up on the honesty and efficiency of the border patrol. Supervising Customs Agent Lewis, Exhibit D, reports:

This action met the full approval of the collector and the assistant collector and these men did very good work along preventive lines.

"Preventive," yes; preventive of any hope of finding out about Bradley.

After a while, even the White House got worried. Under date of January 16, 1932—that was two or three days after the hearings were concluded—Secretary Lowman wrote Senator Warson, Exhibit E, about a certain unsigned memorandum of specifications of charges made against Bradley, a memorandum inserted in the record of the Senate hearings.

There was some discussion about who prepared the memorandum; but Mr. Lowman refreshed his memory, and so, under date of the 16th of January, he wrote the letter which I hold in my hand to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson] about this memorandum. I quote from the letter:

I have been advised by Hon. Walter H. Newton, Secretary to the President, that he prepared the memorandum and has a carbon copy of it in his file. The charges were a résumé of statements contained in numerous letters and affidavits that have been sent to the White House by residents of Buffalo, N. Y.

In his testimony Governor Lowman said to the subcommittee:

There are nine specific charges here, and they cover all the stuff.

Meaning, I assume, that all the charges that had been alleged against Bradley were contained in this White House memorandum.

The entire memorandum makes spicy reading. For instance, the White House writer said:

It is claimed that some data were sent to Senator Borah some time ago and by him sent to the Department of Justice, who transmitted them to the Department of the Treasury for consideration. In connection with the Treasury investigation made in that connection it is claimed that the first thing the Treasury investigators did was to call in the incumbent and that he saw they were royally entertained, and naturally the investigation failed to develop anything under those circumstances.

If this is not true of the Department of Justice investigator, it is true of the Treasury investigators. There are affidavits on file to the effect that Bradley treated his investigator friends so well that they lacked nothing good to eat or drink. Indeed, he is said to have provided a car and chauffeur, sending one investigator on a joy ride to Florida, with one of his inspectors as the driver.

That may not be true; it perhaps is not true. But it is a sworn allegation, and it is time somebody found out whether it is true or false.

THE "QUEEN BEE"

It is charged among other derelictions that this generous collector captured a rum-running boat, a fine little cruiser. He fitted it up and presented it to a friend, the warden of a New York prison.

This charge, according to page 18 of the McAniff and Roberts report—is sustained by the evidence. Collector Bradley did, in fact, deliver to Warden Hunt, of Comstock Prison, on Lake Champlain, N. Y., on July 24, 1929, allegedly for official services of the State of New York, a motor boat known as the Queen Bee, which had been forfeited to the United States, and which had been appraised at a value of $950.

I am quoting from the official report, not giving my opinion. I am telling what the official investigators found out about it.

It was further established that no request was made on Mr. Bradley by the Governor of the State of New York or by the superintendent of prisons.

Indeed, Bradley admitted that he dealt personally and exclusively with Warden Hunt and did not obtain authority from the department for his action. He gave Government property to a personal friend.

There are other transactions relating to boats and automobiles. Each of these should be investigated to get the facts as to how the collector handles and disposes of the property of the United States.

McAniff and Roberts, the two investigators, stated that-

In the limited space of time afforded, a thorough and comprehensive investigation could not be conducted.

Consequently, they could not look into other similar charges, but stated that Bradley, in violation of law, had released at least one prisoner arrested by his patrolmen. They added—

It seems to be established that the preponderance of evidence here sustains this charge.

That is a quotation from the report to Washington, and the event itself is rather interesting, but I do not go into it, although there are affidavits on file regarding the matter.

THE PURITAN CLUB

Because of a statement made by Bradley in the Senate committee hearings, I wish to speak of the so-called Puritan Club. In view of the testimony and affidavits regarding this establishment, I am not sure its name is quite appropriate!

The Puritan Club is said to stand on the bank of the Niagara River. Back of it is quite a strip of shallow water, 2 or 3 feet in depth, perhaps. It is alleged that Bradley dumped or caused to be dumped cargoes of seized liquor into this shallow water. It was said to be recovered and delivered into the clubhouse.

When asked about these recoveries of liquor for improper use in the Puritan Club, Bradley said:

I did hear as an undercurrent that somebody was fishing it out or something. I issued orders after that that every bag must be cut before being thrown in, and that is the practice. (Senate hearings, p. 117.)

Regarding the charge that seized liquor was dumped by Bradley's orders in the shallow water behind the Puritan Club and that liquor was delivered at the collector's farm, the investigators threw up their hands. The Puritan Club is alleged to be the headquarters of smugglers and rivermen engaged in liquor traffic. Regarding this, the investigators reported that—

A proper and comprehensive investigation of this charge could not be made in the limited time allowed us.

It would require several weeks to locate and interview the various witnesses from whom it would be necessary to obtain statements in order to maintain or disprove the truth or falsity of this charge.

Let me say in passing that McAniff and Roberts came the nearest of any of the investigators to getting the truth. But they—

Arrived in Buffalo, N. Y., Monday, the 9th, and were informed on the afternoon of the same day that instructions had been received to have our report in the bureau by the end of the week.

They got there on Monday, and were told to investigate all these charges presented by the White House and to have them in to Washington by the end of the week. That is the record.

Nobody cared to get to the bottom of all the criticism, it appears. Consequently this investigation was not half completed. But it did show that thieves were kept on patrol and the improper disposition of Government property was lightly regarded by those in high places. The investigation showed illegal and improper acts and should have been continued.

THE DREHER CASE

Must I go on? I have not touched the smuggling of carloads of liquor. I have not mentioned the many criticisms passed on the delays of bringing these cases to trial in the Federal court.

Reference is made in Secretary Newton's memorandum to-

The trial of Charles Dreher, United States customs inspector-

He was wrong about that. He was an immigration inspector. But there was a customs inspector in the conspiracy.

The trial of Charles Dreher, United States customs inspector, indicted two years ago on a conspiracy charge, but whose case had been permitted to lie dormant because "United States Attorney Templeton has blocked every effort to bring it to trial."

The memorandum continues:

In order to understand a situation of that kind, you must know that Templeton is just a cog in the machinery built up by Fred Bradley, Republican boss, and takes his orders from him.

One of the unsolved mysteries of the Buffalo border is the Dreher case. In 1929 four men were indicted for participating in the biggest rum-smuggling plot uncovered since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. They were a former immigration officer, a former customs officer of Bradley's staff, and a couple of railway clerks. A conspiracy on the part of these men and various rich bootleggers resulted in enormous numbers of carload shipments of contraband from Canada, across the border to the United States.

For reasons beyond my understanding, they were not brought to trial until April, 1931. It was openly charged that action would not have been taken then except for the pressure of public opinion and the insistence of the press.

It was common rumor that carload shipments had been made for several years. Even Dreher, when asked in court if he had heard of rumors of a rum conspiracy in 1925, replied:

Sure I did, but Harry W. Smith, assistant collector of customs, and his men investigated the case and gave everybody a clean bill of health.

Dreher was one of the last men I should expect to be so frank in admitting anything wrong with Bradley's administration. Certainly he would not have done so if the law violations were not common knowledge. Why do I say this? Because the record shows that Bradley was a friend and a very good friend of Dreher. Indeed, it is alleged—

He showed his friendly connections to Dreher by having created about two years ago an office in the board of supervisors of the county of Erie, an unnecessary office, that of telephone operator. * * Mr. Bradley saw to it that Mrs. Dreher, the wife of Charles Dreher, the defendant in the conspiracy case, was appointed to this position.

This is the charge, and its truth or falsity is easily established. There can be no doubt that the relationship between the collector and the indicted inspector should be investigated. As a matter of fact, one can not read the official records relating to the handling of this conspiracy without having many doubts raised in his mind. There are numerous questions which should be answered.

The important thing to determine is whether or not the collector had guilty knowledge of what is a proved fact, that carload after carload of liquor has come across the Canadian border. It was a long, long time, years indeed, before there was any official recognition of the truth. Why?

SMUGGLING BY THE CARLOAD

As I view it, there was unwillingness to crush lawbreaking, or else such extreme stupidity on the part of the collector that he failed to learn what practically everybody else in Buffalo never doubted. Indeed, it was shown in court that carloads of liquor, billed as oats, rubber, hay, lumber, pulpwood, machinery, oil, and other things, were entering the United States. How long that was going on I can not say.

There was a suspicion in the mind of Secretary Lowman that something was wrong in Bradley's jurisdiction. In a speech made by the Secretary in Williamsville, N. Y., on Labor Day, September 5, 1927, he said this:

Some say that the border around Buffalo leaks and that the customs guard don't do their full duty. I don't know. That may be so. We found it so in Detroit, where rum runners brought a load across in 15 minutes. Control was taken away from the collector of customs, because he was too busy. We sent a Yankee and 200 men up there to see if we can't break up that thing. If we do it, the rum runners probably will come to Buffalo and probably it would be a good thing to remove the collector of customs at Buffalo, because he is too busy, and get another Yankee to take charge of the patrol boys here. (Senate hearings, pp. 83, 84.)

On April 4, 1929, the Secretary of State forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury a report from an American consul in Canada in regard to shipments of liquor inclosed in railway cars with padding of scrap rubber or pulpwood.

One Canadian railway agent stated that at one time he gave a shipper, afterwards found to be involved in this conspiracy, 100 car seals, representing possible shipments of 100 cars of liquor. Unquestionably many hundred, perhaps thousand, carloads of contraband came through Bradley's district before anybody in high place was aroused to action. The underworld knew it, and customs men knew it, but the collector sat unmoved. Needless to say, in the absence of connivance, this gigantic smuggling performance could not have succeeded if ordinary vigilance had been used.

If the collector had guilty knowledge of what was going on, he should be dismissed in disgrace. If he did not know it, he is too stupid to preside over what in many respects is our most important port of entry. Alertness here is vitally important if we are to keep out liquor and legally inadmissible aliens. Our bonded warehouses must be guarded by a man who is above suspicion.

It may be that Bradley is all we desire. In any event, he is entitled to be cleared of the many charges directed against him. If the charges are well founded, the Senate should know the truth.

Frankness compels me to say there is an atmosphere of mystery about the Dreher case, a reluctance to act that continues to this moment. Suspicion attaches to the conduct of the legal proceedings from the very beginning.

THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY

Two years passed before the indicted persons were brought to trial. The United States district attorney in that section is related to Bradley. Of course, that fact may not have a single thing to do with the delay. But it is natural to think about it and to inquire why, in a case of this importance, the district attorney himself did not conduct the trial. He did not, but now after a year since the jury disagreed, according to a letter in the Treasury file, dated February 2, 1932, this district attorney has recommended that the indictments against Dreher and others be nol-prossed.

I am glad to note the protest of the supervising customs agent at Montreal. He urges that—

These cases are very important, and it is my opinion every effort should be made to bring the defendants to trial.

Once more we witness the aloofness of Collector Bradley, his apparent indifference to the seriousness of the situation, and his utter failure to plunge into the duties of his high office. If one of us had been brought under public criticism because of failure to function, I can not doubt that there would be an eagerness to find out what is wrong with us and our employees.

Did Bradley get excited over the crimes committed in his jurisdiction and participated in by his men? He did not. When a few days ago he received the recommendation of the district attorney that the more than 20 indictments pending in his office be nol-prossed, what did Bradley do? Did he protest against such an outrageous proposal involving a shameful miscarriage of justice? He did not. On the contrary, he confesses not alone his lack of conviction but also an abysmal ignorance, real or pretended. He indulges in that old game of "passing the buck."

Let me quote in part from his letter of January 27, 1932:

There is no one in my organization who has studied carefully the evidence that was developed by the investigating officers in these cases.

Would any man of red blood fail under similar circumstances to delve into every fact of a scandal that stirred a whole State and upon the outcome of which his own honor and reputation were at stake? Is it possible that he has a skin like a rhinoceros and a nature absolutely blunted to normal emotions?

So indifferent was the collector to the significance of the trial of these scoundrels that it appears he absented himself not only from the trial but from the community while it was in progress. This fact was commented upon by the press of Buffalo and by all good citizens. There is no doubt in my mind that if his attitude of passivity were exchanged for one of active and energetic cooperation the Dreher case would be solved.

Much was said in the Senate hearings, has been printed in the press, and written to me by Buffalo citizens about Bradley's political activity. Charges are made that political appeals have caused raids to be abandoned. I shall say little about this, because many a good man is holding public office and a place of political preferment at the same time. But it does arouse suspicion that as the powerful political leader Bradley should be the one to recommend a district attorney whose duty it would be to pass on his own official acts. Then when that particular district attorney is a relation, it drives still deeper the suspicion that things are not as they should be.

The Senate can not escape the responsibility, the solemn duty to ascertain the facts. As I have said, we owe this to Bradley. He boasted that the Senate had investigated him and found him innocent. I proclaim to all concerned that the Senate never investigated him, the Department of Justice never investigated him; the Treasury Department, in its firm belief in his integrity, played into Bradley's hands in everything it ever did. It is time that a searching investigation under the authority of the Government be made, and made before all the possible witnesses disappear. That investigation should cover not only what I have presented to-day, but the many other charges made against him and which I have not brought here because so many of them were founded on hearsay.

COLLECTING AND BANKING

It is charged against Bradley, as I said in the beginning, that he consorts with bootleggers, profits by the admission of illegal liquor, shuts his eyes to violations of the customs laws, and conspires against the welfare of his country in promoting grain smuggling. There are sworn statements that he has a satellite who collects on every parcel of liquor admitted, and banked $25,000 acquired in this manner, the money to be divided.

I am anxious to believe that these stories are untrue. However, after considerable difficulty I succeeded in finding that the man accused of being Bradley's accomplice did actually bank $21,000. Where the money came from or whether Bradley profited I do not know, and without the legal power I am helpless to get the truth. A determined committee or the Department of Justice or a grand jury could develop the actual facts.

I have no faith that prohibition can be enforced. The laws relating to it will be flouted by evil men and disregarded by unconvinced citizens. But so long as the prohibition laws are on the statute books it must be the effort of government to enforce them honestly and fearlessly. There is no place in our country where there has been such laxity as in Buffalo. If, in addition to that, there is financial sharing in the illicit traffic by our officials, it is time to strike the practice a blow that will be remembered by all men. We abdicate to the underworld if we permit spineless creatures to be the outward and visible signs of government. The official who fails to keep his oath is a menace to the public welfare.

CONCLUSION

It is time that some agency of government should get to the bottom of the Buffalo situation. Either Mr. Bradley and his cohorts are guilty or else they are the most maligned men in the world. I want the truth, and I believe the Senate wants it. Certainly Buffalo wants it and is entitled to it.

Let us return this nomination to the Finance Committee with instructions to ascertain the facts. I pray that Mr. Bradley is an innocent man. The record is against him. But if that record can be explained, nobody in the Congress will be more pleased than the Senator who is speaking, speaking reluctantly, but because his sense of civic duty would not permit him to be silent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator from New York has made a motion in connection with the nomination? I understood that he intended to move a recommittal of the nomination to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Such a motion has not been made.

Mr. COPELAND. I move that the nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance which investigated this particular appointee. It early developed in the investigation of the case that Mr. Bradley is not only collector of customs, to which office he has been reappointed, but that he was also the chairman of the Erie County Republican Committee. When that fact was disclosed, in the light of other facts in the record, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] and myself took the position that the two offices were necessarily inconsistent. In the city of Buffalo the collector of customs ought not to be the official head of his political party because conflicting interests would necessarily arise from time to time. So we took the position that he ought not to be confirmed if he was to retain his office as county chairman, in all the circumstances of the particular case.

During the investigation Assistant Secretary Lowman appeared before the committee. He referred to four investigations, the same investigations to which the Senator from New York [Mr. Copeland] has referred in his presentation of the matter. Those investigations had been made by the Treasury Department and in one instance by the Attorney General or the Department of Justice. I infer—in fact, my recollection is—that Governor Lowman stated that none of those investigations disclosed any connection whatever on the part of Mr. Bradley with any of the alleged misconduct, malconduct, and crime.

In view of Governor Lowman's statement, which as I recollect it was to the effect just detailed, and the attitude taken by both the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] and myself with respect to his remaining collector of customs in the event he desired to retain his political office, I did not make an examination, or at least a detailed examination, of all of the records in the case; that is, of the several investigations made, and to which Governor Lowman referred in his testimony.

Since the report of the subcommittee to the full Finance Committee, some matters have come to my attention, both through the Senator from New York [Mr. Copeland] and through other sources, which lead me to believe that the committee might have made a more thorough investigation of the report of the inspectors themselves who did investigate the charges against Mr. Bradley at Buffalo. I therefore believe that the nomination ought to be referred back to the committee for a further investigation.

I should say that Mr. Bradley signified his intention to resign, on some date named or at some time fixed, from his office as chairman of the Republican committee of Erie County, and that of course disposed of that particular matter upon which both the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] and myself based our original vote against his confirmation. But with the assurance that he would resign from that committee, we said that we would favorably recommend Mr. Bradley to the full committee.

Mr. Bradley himself personally appeared before the committee, and I was rather impressed with the honesty of Mr. Bradley. He seemed to answer questions in a very straightforward way and seemed disposed to disclose to the committee any matter about which inquiry was made. But in view of the fact that I myself, at least, accepted the statement of Governor Lowman, which statement I do not mean now to say was not strictly accurate and fair; in view of the fact that I did not make examination of the report submitted by the investigators; and in view of some information which has since reached me, much of which has been detailed by the Senator from New York [Mr. Copeland] before the Senate this morning, it is my judgment that this matter ought to be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, having suffered an attack of influenza and having only partially recovered, I am in no physical condition to make a speech, and I have no desire to do so. I merely desire to make a short statement.

The Committee on Finance referred the nomination of Mr. Bradley to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens], to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. George], and to me, as the chairman of the subcommittee. We gave notice to all persons interested whom we could find, and through the Buffalo newspapers, that we would hold hearings at a certain time, which we fixed for that purpose. At that time various persons appeared. In the statement issued by the subcommittee we said that we would not pay the expenses of any witness coming to Washington, but that anyone who wanted voluntarily to come might do so and appear before the committee. Many persons came.

It early developed that Mr. Bradley was the Republican chairman in the city of Buffalo and the county of Erie, and that he had been so for 10 years, possibly for 12 years; and that he was what they called a "political boss" in that community, a city of some six or seven hundred thousand people. It developed in the course of the investigation that the charges made against Mr. Bradley were nearly altogether political; that is to say, that they grew out of his connection with the Republican county committee and not out of his connection with the office of collector of customs.

The principal witness who appeared—and I shall not mention his name—was one who admitted that he had been a candidate for office four times and had been defeated. It was so evident that personal animosity was impelling him to testify that—and I think the other members of the subcommittee will agree with me in the statement—we were not particularly impressed by what he had to say. It was quite evident from the testimony of others who appeared that it was something in the nature of baffled hope or blighted ambition that prompted them to testify.

It appeared in the course of the testimony that two investigations had been made by the Treasury Department, one investigation by the Department of Justice, and one investigation by the Commissioner of Customs. They all gave Mr. Bradley a clean bill of health in so far as his connection with the office of collector of customs was concerned and his discharge of the duties of that office.

Of course there were irregularities, but there were many charges against this man which were not sustained by any testimony. There were suspicions, of course, because no man could hold two such offices in a city like Buffalo and escape all suspicion, but when sifted down we did not find any basis upon which we could justify a finding against this man as collector of customs.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield at that point?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the committee was entirely justified in reaching that conclusion, so far as the testimony was concerned.

Mr. WATSON. I am coming to that in a moment, and I thank the Senator from New York for that observation.

Of course, the committee does not want to rest under the charge of not having discharged its obligation or having done but a poor job. We did not send for anybody to come; we merely gave notice that anybody might testify who wanted to come.

Four official investigations having been made, we came to the conclusion—and it was a unanimous conclusion—that it would be far better if Mr. Bradley were not both county chairman and collector of customs, because there was an incongruity and an inconsistency in his holding the two positions, particularly when the main charges against him grew out of his chairmanship of a political committee. I conferred with him and with others who were his associates, and finally said that in my judgment he would not be confirmed unless that situation were adjusted in some way.

It developed in the testimony that his term as county chairman will expire on the 5th of April, next month. Finally we entered into an arrangement by which he agreed not to be a candidate for reelection on the 5th of April to the position of county chairman if his nomination as collector of customs were favorably reported. We entered into that agreement, and he has announced, as I understand, that he will not be a candidate and will not accept the position if it be tendered him; so that his connection with the county committee will be severed on the 5th of April, when the county committee shall meet for the election of a chairman.

The thought ran in my mind while the Senator from New York was speaking that if the governmental departments having matters of this kind in charge have investigated a man and have given him a clean bill of health, what is the Senate committee to do? Are we to go into the matter of appointing detectives and special agents on the part of the Senate or of the Finance Committee and send them to a given locality to investigate the whole business? Are we going, at great public expense, to throw out a dragnet and call everybody here from Buffalo who wants to come? Is the time of the Finance Committee, busy as that committee is, to be taken up, or is the time of a subcommittee of that committee, whose members are equally busy, to be taken up by investigating this whole business? Are we going into such an investigation? If these outside agencies of the Government, whose special and peculiar business it ought to be to look into those things, have investigated, however superficial their investigation may have been, and have given him a clean bill of health, what are we to do? That is the question that confronted me.

I would not care if we should undertake an investigation of the whole thing; but my honest, candid opinion is, I will say to my colleagues, that a thorough investigation would not disclose any such malfeasance or misfeasance in office as collector of customs that this body would take cognizance of if we knew all the facts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has stated that the committee reached the conclusion that there was an inconsistency in Mr. Bradley acting as chairman of a political committee, county chairman of his party organization, and serving as collector of customs, and that, at the committee's suggestion, he has pledged himself to sever that connection or rather not to continue it after the expiration of his present term as chairman?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was evidence submitted tending to show misconduct on the part of Mr. Bradley as county chairman or was the action of the committee in that particular based merely on an assumed inconsistency between the two services?

Mr. WATSON. I am glad the Senator has asked that question, because the two are crisscross in this way: There were no charges of misfeasance or malfeasance against Mr. Bradley as county chairman; there were charges that he was a political boss and used his power to run over people who wanted to be candidates and were anxious to gratify their ambition in a political way. Of course, it was very natural that such charges should be made, but we did not pay much attention to them. So far as I am personally concerned, it does not interfere with my ideas of propriety at all for a man to be a county chairman or to be in politics and to hold another position at the same time. But all these charges, I am satisfied in my mind, grew out of the fact that Mr. Bradley was county chairman and not that he was collector of customs, because those who came to testify, as I have said, were animated by blighted ambition and thwarted hope.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President-

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I made no use whatever in my statement of the hearsay and biased testimony given to the committee. That is the reason why I say that from the record and from the hearings the committee had a right to reach the conclusion it did; but, failing to study the exhibits which were presented, the papers which were left by Governor Lowman, the committee did not get the truth, which is that no one of the investigations was ever complete; and, furthermore, that in the records which were in the hands of the committee but which were not studied—and I do not blame the committee for that—there is abundant evidence that there was corruption and dishonesty and bad management of the office. I spoke particularly of the eight patrolmen who were found by the first investigation to be guilty of stealing gasoline, but who, two years later, when the next group of inspectors went there, were found to be still in office. In other words, concealed in the exhibits presented to the committee, which the committee did not have time, because of its many other duties, to examine carefully, there was evidence which was sufficient to raise very serious question as to the propriety of continuing Mr. Bradley in office.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I realize that the Senator from Indiana would not like to be kept on his feet longer than is necessary; I do not wish to impose on him, and, if he prefers, I will wait until he shall have concluded.

Mr. WATSON. I will be very glad to yield, if the Senator wants to ask a question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I want to discuss two subjects, and I can do it now just as well as later.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the committee has by implication raised a very important question in its recommendation that Mr. Bradley discontinue his leadership as political partisan during the time of his service as collector of customs. I wonder if it is generally known that in some parts of the country, particularly in the South, every important Federal officeholder under the present administration is a prominent political leader, occupying a prominent political position as the head of his party? I see the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long] nods his head in approval. In the Southern States I do not know of a single United States marshal, collector of internal revenue, prominent postmaster, or other important political officeholder who did not get his political office through his occupancy of a partisan position.

The way that is accomplished is that the political committees are composed almost entirely of occupants of Federal offices, or of their relatives; and when one becomes national committeeman, or chairman of the State central committee, or chairman of the county committee, it carries with it the consideration that, unless some providential event intervenes to prevent, he shall take the Federal office corresponding with the rank and dignity of his political position.

The national committeeman, for instance, becomes United States district attorney. The chairman of the State central committee becomes collector of internal revenue. The marshal's office is filled by the vice chairman or by a county chairman who is strong in his activities.

Mr. LONG. There are grades in party, as there are grades in office

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; the official recognition in Federal office is graded according to the political standing of the aspirant and his political relations.

That situation prevails largely throughout the South.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator let me ask him whether or not they fill both positions at the same time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; oh, yes.

Mr. WATSON. Does the man hold the positions of United States district attorney and State chairman at the same time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and not only that, but there have been instances, to illustrate—I may not state the Federal office accurately—where one man was State chairman, national committeeman, and collector.

Mr. LONG. There is the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to-day.

Mr. WATSON. Did they have enough Republicans down there to fill all the places? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, frankly, a little competition sometimes arises. There have been instances when there was a slight insurrection of the "outs" against the "ins," as the Senator from Indiana seems to think this Bradley contest illustrates in the State of New York.

The second proposition that I wanted to mention briefly, however—and I will do it briefly—is the fact that the Senator from New York, in asking that the nomination be recommitted, disclosed that the departmental investigations had never been completed; that for some reasons that are not explained they are not satisfactory to the mind of any person, I think, who is familiar with the process which a bona fide investigation is supposed to take.

For instance, the man who went to Buffalo to make an investigation on the basis of letters submitted by a Senator, in which serious charges were made, went under instructions to submit his report to the department the very day following his arrival there; and he himself reported that his investigation was incomplete, and therefore unreliable, because he was under the necessity of reporting before he had been able to complete the investigation. There is no explanation in the record why that course was pursued. There is nothing here to show that there was any such emergency situation as required this man to discontinue his efforts before anyone familiar with such undertakings could assume that he should have had an opportunity of completing them.

In my judgment, that impeaches the value of the investigation. If departments, for any reason, are to be permitted to make conclusive their own investigations when, on the face of the investigations, they have neither been bona fide nor complete, then, of course, the Senate will estop itself from reaching those sources of information essential to the performance of its duties.

I have no prejudice against Mr. Bradley. I never heard of him; and I do not in any sense criticize the subcommittee. I think they did just about what I would have done.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, we have paid no attention, of course, to the larger aspects of the case as presented by the Senator.

In my State—and it is about as much of a political State as there is anywhere—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that is true.

Mr. WATSON. In my State a postmaster is never county chairman. He can not be. A county chairman may become postmaster by reason of the fact that he has been county chairman and is entitled to the political reward; but under no circumstances could any man in my State hold both places. A man who has been State chairman may be selected for some position by virtue of the fact that he has been State chairman; but I am very glad to have the Senator raise the question. After all, however, if the Senator will pardon me, I think it is a side issue, as far as the question we have to determine here is concerned.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. KING. As I understood my dear friend, whose illness we deplore very much, the objections to Mr. Bradley appear to be only because of political considerations. I, of course, do not know what came before the committee; but I received a number of letters protesting against his confirmation—I suppose the letters were written to me as a member of the Finance Committee—upon the ground that he consorted with persons of the underworld, of questionable character, and was seen drinking in places of questionable character.

For that reason, as well as others that were evidenced in the letters, I declined to vote for the confirmation of Mr. Bradley. As I say, I had nothing against him. I have nothing against him now. I hope that there is nothing in any of these charges; but in the light of the letters sent to me I did not feel that I could vote for him, and I did not.

Mr. WATSON. I remember that I asked him, when some of those charges were made, whether, when he visited those places, he was there as collector of customs or as chairman of the Republican county committee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I did not want it understood, and I do not think the Senator from Arkansas meant to have it understood, that we have made any protest against the official occupying a similar status in the party as he did in office. We rather approve that in my part of the country, because I do not think there would be enough Republicans in some of those counties to fill the offices if it were not for the party status which assigns a man a similar position in the office-holding list when it comes along.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what the Senator from Arkansas has had to say about the investigation made in response to a letter written by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] I think is a valid objection; but here is the situation as I understand it.

This came immediately after an investigation had been made by the Treasury Department; and my recollection is—I may be in error in this—that this man had the report of that investigation, and concluded that it was not necessary to go to see everybody, and did not go to see everybody.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, no. In one case read by the Senator from New York, the fact was that the investigator arrived at Buffalo on the 2d, and was under instructions to submit his report on the 3d.

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And that he only had the opportunity of seeing a few of the witnesses whose names had been submitted to him.

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And he had no opportunity of seeing such witnesses as any of them might suggest; and in his report he set up the fact that he had not completed his work, and was submitting his report only because he was compelled to do it.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Now, what was the reason for such haste in a matter of that character?

Mr. WATSON. I think that would be a valid objection, unless he had in his hands or had knowledge of these other reports that had been made by the collector of customs or by the Treasury Department.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But that does not apply. Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. The man from the Department of Justice did not have the other reports in his hands.

Mr. WATSON. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. COPELAND. From the record.

Mr. WATSON. The record does not make that statement. Mr. COPELAND. Yes; that is the record. Furthermore, in the further investigation, the nearest investigation made by McAniff and Roberts, they went into Buffalo with all this material to which the Senator refers in their possession—the affidavits, the record of previous examinations, and all that sort of thing—but, as in the case of the Department of Justice man, although it is not quite so bad, they got there on Monday and received instructions at once to have their report in by the end of the week. I quoted the exact language from the report which came to Washington.

Mr. WATSON. I remember that.

Mr. COPELAND. So there never has been, by any investigator or set of investigators, any conclusive examination of all the material in the possession of the Government.

Mr. WATSON. Let me ask the Senator, while he is on his feet, what kind of investigations does the Senator propose to be made by the Senate Finance Committee?

Mr. COPELAND. I hope the Senator will not draw me into that

Mr. WATSON. Yes; I must, because the Senator is moving to refer the nomination back to the Finance Committee for the purpose of having an investigation. What kind of investigation does the Senator want? If the Department of Justice and if the Customs Bureau and if the Treasury Department have already made their reports, can we inspire them to make other reports and other investigations? Can we instigate them to go further into this matter? If so, how can we? And if they will not do it, how are we to do it?

Mr. COPELAND. I recognize the difficulties. In the first place, if a grand-jury investigation were talked about, we would immediately come up against the fact that the district attorney is a relative of Mr. Bradley. Even if we proposed that the Department of the Treasury should make the investigation, we have his conviction—and I do not say it in disparagement of Governor Lowman—his conviction that Mr. Bradley is all right. It would seem to me that the best way to do would be to have the Department of Justice, through Mr. Edgar Hoover, go forward with a real investigation. That would be my judgment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am satisfied that all the members of the subcommittee concluded that Bradley is an honest man. In fact, the Senator from Georgia has so stated on the floor this morning.

So far as I could find out from the testimony-and I listened to it, as did the other members of the subcommitteethere was nothing involving him directly in any scandal or in any violation of law; certainly nothing involving him in any corruption. I am surprised at what the Senator from New York says, that there is something in this testimony involving him in corruption. I saw nothing of that kind and heard nothing of that kind. I did run hastily over the documents submitted. I did not make a careful investigation, I will say to the Senator; and I found nothing there, and I remember nothing in the testimony that did not arise out of the fact that he had been the county chairman and not that he had been collector of customs. Inasmuch as he has consented to dissociate himself voluntarily from the office of county chairman, I thought we might well afford to confirm him, because all the difficulty arose out of that relationship, and none of it out of the relationship that he sustained to the office of collector of customs.

That was my conclusion, and I think it was the conclusion of all the members of the subcommittee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana further yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator forgets about the testimony which was brought before the committee regarding the Puritan Club in connection with the statement made by McAniff and Roberts that as regards that charge it would take weeks to get the truth. That was the statement. Furthermore, I found in the records of the committee—and they are there—certain affidavits that were made regarding that particular thing.

The fact is, let me say to my genial and ever-kind friend from Indiana-

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say this: I think Mr. Bradley is entitled to have the facts brought out. He is widely charged by the press and by citizens of Buffalo with failure to do his duty as collector of customs.

He is entitled to it, and I think the wise way and the proper way and the most decent way to deal with the matter is to refer it back to the committee and let the committee decide how they shall find out the truth regarding the administration of that office.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. Watson].

In view of the peculiar circumstances under which the investigation described by the Senator from New York, and referred to by the Senator from Indiana, was made; in view of the fact that admittedly the investigation was not thorough, and that without further inquiry the whole question will be left in doubt; that Mr. Bradley will continue in office, if he should be confirmed, under a cloud; and in fair recognition of the rights of the public in the matter to have the facts ascertained, if possible, it would seem to me that the suggestion that the nomination go back to the committee for further study ought not to be resisted.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] and I have consulted about the matter, and I defer to him to make answer.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. George], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Watson], and I were the subcommittee which held the hearings, the Senator from Indiana being the chairman. At the time we first got together we agreed that we were not going to authorize the payment of expenses involved in subpænaing and bringing to Washington all of the people from Erie County who were complaining. Complaints were being received, and it was quite evident, from the circumstances, that the opposition to Mr. Bradley was a political fight, because the main witness who appeared before the committee, as I recall it, was a man who had been a candidate for office three times, and defeated, and he charged that each time Bradley had opposed him, although this man was a Republican. It seemed to me that it was a political fight.

The Senator from Georgia, the Senator from Indiana, and myself agreed that we were not going to the expense and trouble of subpenaing all of the disappointed persons who wanted to come to Washington and testify. So we agreed that anyone who desired to come to Washington, paying his own expenses, and testify would be heard. As I recall it, only one witness, the candidate who had been defeated three times, came to Washington and testified. He also sent a man who was living in Washington to come and testify.

Assistant Secretary of Treasury Lowman was put on the witness stand, was sworn, and gave his testimony under oath. All witnesses were put under oath, including the nominee himself, Mr. Bradley. Mr. Bradley heard the testimony submitted by the various witnesses. He denied it all categorically. Assistant Secretary Lowman denied that the things charged were so. Mr. Eble, the Commissioner of Customs, denied that they were so. I think Mr. Edgar Hoover said something about the matter, though I have not refreshed my mind as to his testimony. Bradley also went on the stand and denied all these things, as I have said.

All through the testimony the question was occurring to me as to how we were going to reconcile this contradictory evidence. Most of it was given under oath. I could not conceive of any way to determine who was telling the truth and who was not. Undoubtedly somebody was lying. I do not know now how we would prove who was telling the truth and who was not.

The testimony which the Senator from New York has called to the attention of the Senate I submit presents a prima facie case which is bad, but now I do not know how we are to prove whether that testimony is correct or not correct. Bradley denies it. How are we going to settle the question as to who is telling the truth?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think that if the committee should request the Department of Justice to make a thorough investigation of particular charges, assigning one of its agents, or a number of its agents, to make the investigation, and submit the evidence and the findings, that would obviate the difficulty which has been suggested, and we would be able to approach the matter from the standpoint of the facts. I am not willing to assume that the Department of Justice would not make a fair investigation in the matter.

We have this situation: Here is one connected with the department, who has personal as well as political affiliations running through the department. It is not pleasant for one of his friends to be assigned the task of exposing him and driving him out of office, and quite naturally, and without any conscious dereliction of duty, there is often failure on the part of the departmental officers, who do not regard themselves as directly responsible to the Congress or the Senate for their actions, to render a thorough performance of duty in those investigations.

While the committee was entirely right in not setting the precedent of paying everybody's expenses to Washington who might desire to come, it is also true, as any lawyer knows, and as most gentlemen of the experience of the Senator from Michigan know, that frequently witnesses to transactions which ought to be exposed and condemned are reluctant to put themselves in the attitude of having volunteered information, and, in addition to that, they are not quick to incur a large amount of expense. They feel that it is a matter of general importance, and what is everybody's business is nobody's business.

If we are to establish the precedent of determining questions of this character on investigations which admittedly are not thorough, on investigations which are discontinued on instructions from above before they can be completed, we might just as well announce that we will never go into the investigation of charges against a Federal officeholder.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that no evidence was submitted to the committee that the investigation was not complete.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senator from New York read the report of one of the investigators assigned by the Department of Justice, I think he said, who arrived in Buffalo on the evening of the 2d and who was ordered to report on the 3d.

Mr. COUZENS. That was not before the committee. That might have been submitted in documents, but it was not submitted as a matter of testimony.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Whether it was before the committee or not, it was submitted to the Senate. No one, so far as I know, is criticizing the committee. The Senator from New York himself said the committee was not subject to criticism. But it appears now, when the Senate is called upon to dispose of the matter, that the investigations, which ought to have precluded the necessity for further inquiry, were, I think I am justified in saying, not bona fide.

This investigator said in his report:

I have not had opportunity of completing this investigation. I have only seen a few of the witnesses whose names have been suggested by the Senator from Idaho. I can not see the others. Nor can I follow his suggestion and discuss the subject with witnesses whom they might suggest. So, under your orders, I am reporting to-night, the 3d, having arrived here on the 2d, that I have not gone through the matter, that I do not know what the facts are.

I think the conclusion arises that the investigator himself did not regard his work as entitled to be relied on.

In view of the fact that it is brought to the attention of the Senate now, it does seem to me that the proper thing to do is to let the matter go back to the committee; and if the members of the committee desire, they may ask the Department of Justice to investigate. That department knows how to investigate matters and get the facts. They have skilled investigators; and if they desire to do it, they can get the record in such condition that the Senate would be willing to rely upon the report, or witnesses could be called as might appear necessary.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator did not let me complete my statement. I am not resisting the matter going back to the committee. I am trying to tell the Senate why the subcommittee reported favorably to the whole committee, and why the committee reported to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I said during the remarks of the Senator from Indiana that upon the statement of the action of the committee as submitted by him, and by the Senator from New York, I thought the committee did just what I would have done if I had been a member of it.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I remember the Senator saying that; but I, being a member, and the other members of the subcommittee having made their statements, I thought I was entitled to make a statement as to my views about it.

Nothing in the testimony of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lowman at any time indicated that the examination and investigation had not been completed. The testimony to which the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has referred concerning the investigation made by the Department of Justice, and all the reports from them which he has read, I confess, are new to the subcommittee. But I think the subcommittee had a right to take the sworn testimony of Commissioner Eble; of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lowman; of Mr. Dow, Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Customs; and others, that after they had completed their investigation they gave Mr. Bradley a clean bill of health.

They were the responsible officers, and the committee did not go back and investigate the information submitted to these public officials, which was the information on which they based their final conclusions. We took the conclusions of the responsible officers. We did not investigate the investigators. We did not even read the reports of the investigators. But this testimony was so conclusive to the committee that the Senator from Georgia and I particularly discussed the question of holding the dual offices. The Senator from Georgia and I, between ourselves, agreed that, in view of the testimony submitted, if Bradley would in writing agree not to retain both offices we would report favorably to the Committee on Finance; and that was the result of the investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to me it seems perfectly clear that the subcommittee did its full and fair duty under all the circumstances. I think every Senator who happens to be on a committee before which many appointments come finds frequently, as I know we do on the Committee on the Judiciary, that charges which on paper seem to be sound on investigation are found to be groundless. It is often found that they are made out of personal or political animosity or spite.

If we are told that an investigation has been made in a department, and have no reason to doubt that it was fair and full and in good faith, we take the conclusions of the investigators, and I think that is proper. So from what I may say I do not want anyone to get the idea that I am casting any reflection on the subcommittee as not having done its duty. I think, considering the evidence which has been narrated here, I would have done just as the members of the subcommittee did.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The committee was advised of not only one investigation of this case, but the Senator will recall, from the statement made by the Senator from New York, that there were four separate investigations.

Mr. NORRIS. It was perfectly natural, and they did just what seems to me, with the information they had, would be the proper thing to do. I listened to the speech made by the Senator from New York. I listened to all of it carefully. I do not believe any unbiased, unprejudiced man could listen to that speech and consider the documents and evidence which he produced and not be impressed that if the things stated are anywhere near true this man ought not to be confirmed.

I do not believe I would have taken the floor if it had not been for the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] about a future investigation. As disclosed by the speech of the Senator from New York, it seems to me the trouble is that the investigations upon which the committee relied were not full and fair investigations as made by the department. I was impressed with the fact those investigations were not fair investigations. If there is anything in the speech of the Senator from New York that impressed me more than that, I do not remember it. The investigations, upon which were based the conclusions afterwards submitted by the subcommittee, it seems to me were not properly made.

I do not agree with the Senator from Arkansas that if the nomination goes back to the committee the committee ought to ask the department to investigate. I believe the committee ought to investigate. I do not want to cast any reflection on the department, but all four of the investigations, according to letters and documents which the Senator from New York has read to-day, it seems to me were not full, complete, or fair investigations. I agree, too, with the committee that in considering a case of this kind we are often confronted by people who want to come to Washington and have their expenses paid, and that is the main reason why they want to testify. I know we have had to refuse them in other committees, just as this committee did, and did rightly, too; but we do find cases where we can not properly do that. I think such a case is presented to us now. I would take the evidence produced by the Senator from New York and investigate the facts in relation to all the matters he laid before us to-day. The committee ought to do it. It may be the best way to accomplish that would be for the committee to go to Buffalo.

Mr. WATSON. But we have not the time to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. I know we have not the time, just as we have not the time for anything if we do it thoroughly and completely. But there are people who ought to testify who will never volunteer, and they are sometimes the best witnesses in the world. Sometimes we must almost use compulsion to get them to testify. They do not want to disclose the things they know. There is another class of people who can not afford to come to Washington. If it is necessary to bring them here to get the facts, we ought not to stop at the expense. It seems to me, with the outline laid down by the Senator from New York to-day, a committee of the Senate, if they will take his speech and investigate the various charges that he has laid before us and the evidence which has been offered in support of them, could readily and properly do this work, and that is all that will be necessary; but at least that ought to be done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The suggestion that the committee arrange with the Department of Justice to supply impartial agents to make an investigation was prompted by the fact, which is recognized by all of us, that it would be very difficult for the members of the committee to abandon their legislative duties and devote the time necessary to make the inquiry themselves. But that is a matter which the committee would have to determine. If the committee should not feel that was the proper thing to do, it could provide its own investigators and the Senate would pay the expense of the investigators. Upon ascertaining the names of important witnesses and the substance of their testimony, the committee then would be undoubtedly justified in bringing them here, just as they would in case the investigation was made by agents of the Department of Justice.

Mr. NORRIS. I only made a suggestion to the committee. I do not want to be understood as trying to tell the committee what they should do. It may be there are a great many witnesses and that the Government ought to pay the expenses of those witnesses to come to Washington. They could not be had unless we subpensed them to come here. It would be much cheaper as a financial proposition for the subcommittee to go to Buffalo or to employ an investigator to go there. It may be that would require some action on the part of the Senate, but I do not think any Senator would hesitate to intrust the committee with that authority if they do not have it already under their general authority.

We have here a case where most startling charges are made, where the most remarkable charges have been made, some of them fairly well demonstrated by the documentary evidence which the Senator from New York has produced. Of course, there may be an explanation. The man against whom the charges are made ought to have an opportunity to explain them. I do not know the man; I have no particular interest in the matter; but we can not afford to confirm the nomination of a man for an important office of this kind in the face of the charges and evidence we have heard stated here to-day by the Senator from New York and apparently well authenticated.

In the first place, a man who is holding a political office such as this man is holding never ought to be appointed to a governmental position unless before he enters upon the duties of that office he will resign his political office. For a dozen years, I believe the Senator from Indiana [Mr.

Warson's said, he has been, as he put it, the political boss in Buffalo. A man ought not to hold such a position and at the same time hold an important governmental office. There are too many conflicting interests that arise in the course of his official duties for him properly to hold two such offices at the same time. I think we would all agree to that. It seems to me the least that can be done is to refer the nomination back to the committee and let the committee make a full investigation of all the charges.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to recommit the nomination to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION-THAD H. BROWN

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the debate that has proceeded concerning the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Bradley for collector of customs at the port of Buffalo, N. Y., has been very apropos, coming prior to the consideration of the nomination of Mr. Brown for appointment to the Federal Radio Commission, because the principal objection I have to the confirmation of Brown is that he has been an active politician, engaged in active politics for many, many years, and I have reached the conclusion that the Federal Radio Commission, having to do with radiobroadcasting and radio communications, is not a place where partisan politics should be played. I am going to read briefly a statement concerning some of the facts.

On February 23, 1927, Congress enacted legislation to create the Federal Radio Commission and turned over to that commission the great authority it now possesses. Even prior to that time radiobroadcasting and communications had made rapid strides, during which time Congress failed to recognize the potentialities of the radio as a means of communication to the people of the Nation. Congress tried from June, 1910, up to February, 1927, several devices to regulate radio; but as the industry developed it became apparent that it was necessary for Congress to provide permanent means for the regulation of this great new discovery.

The power of radiobroadcasting as a means of conveying information and propaganda to the people is not yet fully comprehended, although great financial interests have not been asleep to the possibilities. This has been particularly evidenced by the fact that the Department of Justice in 1930 filed a suit to dissolve certain combinations. This suit has been pending for some time, and a few days ago the Department of Justice filed in the Federal Court of Delaware an amended suit, stating at that time that they expected the case to come to trial this spring. The power of these combinations to control the future of radio is probably equaled by the great power of the Federal Radio Commission to allow monopolies to get control of licenses to broadcast and to engage in the communication field.

The act of 1927 prescribes the powers of the commission. Section 4. in part, says:

Except as otherwise provided in this act, the commission, from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires, shall-

Then it goes on to enumerate the responsibilities and powers of the commission.

The point I want to emphasize is that the radio commissioners have the entire power to say what is in the public interest. That is a power which I believe is greater than the power of any independent commission in Washington. The independent commissions, the Federal Trade Commission, the Tariff Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission are agencies of Congress; they are not executive departments of the Government, and are not to be used for political purposes.

This brings me to the nomination of Thad E. Brown, of Ohio, whose appointment was made to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Commissioner Robinson as a member of the commission from the second zone, and the appointment is for a 6-year period beginning February 24, 1932.

If Mr. Brown should be confirmed, he would be a powerful factor in the regulation and control of what constitutes the most powerful agency for public service that has yet been devised by the mind of man. It is even more a powerful agency for private propaganda. Private companies not only control radio instruments of all kinds but also operate the stations through which intelligence is conveyed to the public. Private interests introduce their voices into the homes of our people every hour of the day. Educators throughout the Nation are battling with private monopoly to gain some rights in this great agency of communication, so that our people may derive some advantage from this Governmentcontrolled agency. The extent to which they succeed depends, under the present law, upon the willingness of the Federal Radio Commission.

I do not recall during my service in the Senate that any appointment has ever been made to the independent commissions created by Congress, as their representatives, of active political organizers such as the activities of Brown disclosed him to be. I do not recall, as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee and as a member of that committee ever since I have been in the Senate, a single nomination being sent to that committee for membership on the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Radio Commission, or the Federal Trade Commission, of a man who was a political organizer and active in partisan politics. I resent these independent commissions, created by Congress as their agent, being filled with politicians, politicians in the sense that they are active in electing individuals rather than advocating before the people some question of policy.

Mr. Brown's work during the latter part of his life, with which we are familiar, has been work and association with politics; and by that I mean organized politics, interested in obtaining political victories as distinct from political service given freely in behalf of a cause. Through political influence and the payment of political debts he was appointed general counsel of the Federal Power Commission, where he served for only a few months, and later was appointed as general counsel for the Federal Radio Commission, where he has been since December 16, 1929.

Prior to entering the Federal service, Mr. Brown was active in Ohio politics. He was elected secretary of state for the State of Ohio and took office January 8, 1923. The secretary of state had charge of the distribution of automobile license tags under the Ohio statute. There were set up over 300 agencies for the selling of automobile licenses, with arrangements to make deposits in an equal number of banks. To be accurate, the number of banks was, as I recall, 341. These banks were used as a political machine, and public money was used to create favors with those banks, which Brown afterwards used in his candidacy for the governorship. At the end of his campaign for the governorship an exposé concerning the use of these funds was made in the the banks without interest payments being made.

State of Ohio. I propose to go into this in more detail later on.

The law which governs the deposits of this license-tag money provides that-

The secretary of state shall open an account with each municipal corporation and county district of registration in the State. All registrations and duplicate registration fees he shall pay weekly-

I want to emphasize the word "weekly"into the State treasury with other receipts of his office.

Several audits of these accounts were made by the examiners for the auditor of the State of Ohio. In a report filed November 21, 1925, it is stated on page 25—and I have the auditor's report here on my desk-

However, weekly deposits of the State treasury were not made by the secretary of state—  $\,$

That is, Mr. Brown-

as required by section 6309, as will be shown by the automobile department's records of the various bank accounts, a transcript of which is attached hereto and made a part hereof, marked "Exhibit A."

That exhibit is in the file.

In many instances the amount left in the depository bank after draft was made by the secretary of state was much larger than the amount transferred to the State treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I am particularly interested in the statement the Senator has just read. I am wondering if I apprehend it correctly. As I understand, Mr. Brown drew drafts on the banks and withdrew money which the law required him to take out every week and deposit somewhere?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; to deposit in the State treasury. Mr. NORRIS. But, as a matter of fact, he left more money in the banks after these drafts than he took out?

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct; and the testimony that I will read later will develop that fact.

Mr. NORRIS. Was it claimed, then, by him that he had complied with the law, when the law required him, I suppose, to take all the money out?

Mr. COUZENS. I am going to develop that. What I want to say in that connection is that when the Committee on Interstate Commerce examined Brown on this one particular point, to show how slippery and unreliable he is, he

I sat in the office every Saturday afternoon to sign drafts to draw the funds out of these same 341 Ohio banks.

That statement of itself sounds all right, but upon examination—and, mind you, he did not testify to this before the committee-upon examination it was found that when he was signing these checks, which he said he sat in his office every Saturday afternoon to sign, he was only withdrawing from 30 to 40 per cent of the amounts then in the banks, the balance having been left in the banks for the use of the banks without any interest to the State. No interest would ever have been paid had it not been for the discovery made by the auditors of the State of Ohio.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, did the law require him to withdraw all of it?

Mr. COUZENS. The law required him to withdraw all of it every week.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if he had to withdraw it for the benefit of the State treasury, would the money then have been deposited in other banks?

Mr. COUZENS. It would have been deposited to the credit of the State treasurer, and the State treasurer would have collected interest on it, but the State was getting no interest under the plan adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The law provides that the deposits of the State treasury shall draw interest, does it?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; and I am coming to that later, because there was a refund made to the State of Ohio by the banks when it was discovered that this money was left with Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was wondering whether it would not amount to a transfer from one group of banks to another group of banks?

Mr. COUZENS. By the banks which were made depositories of this money by the secretary of the State no interest was paid.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. COUZENS. But when it was deposited and credited to the State treasurer interest was paid.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So that it amounted to depriving the State of interest on the portion of the fund not withdrawn?

Mr. COUZENS. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if, in view of the facts stated, this does not follow: This man was candidate for governor?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And the effect of his withdrawing only part of the money, in addition to losing interest on it, was to leave in the banks at his will a large amount of money, from which any reasonable man, I should think, might draw the conclusion that it would, perhaps, assist him very greatly to have these 341 banks retain money that he might have otherwise drawn out. Leaving in the banks all the money he did leave with them could really be considered as a personal favor from him to those banks.

. Mr. COUZENS. I think that is a perfectly sound conclusion, because, as I say, he was an active candidate for governor; he was using the office of the secretary of the State and the funds which were collected by that office as a means for his political advancement; and I object to using public funds and using independent commissions for the purpose of political advancement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President-

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What reason did he give for not drawing funds from the deposit banks in accordance with the provisions of the law?

Mr. COUZENS. The testimony is printed, and I think, perhaps, I will come to that. If I do not, I will ask to have the Senator remind me later on.

I continue to quote from the auditor's report, filed November 1, 1925:

During the early part of 1924-

That was the time that Brown was secretary of state—after transfers were made to the State treasury, the balance remaining in depositary banks amounted, in the aggregate, to several million dollars and was more than the amount transferred.

In other words, at the time he was transferring this money—at the time he testified before the Committee on Interstate Commerce and endeavored to mislead the committee by saying that he was drawing this money out on Saturday afternoons—the auditor's report says that he left several million dollars in these banks after signing these drafts on Saturday afternoon. In other words, he was making a hero of himself by sitting in the office Saturday afternoons to sign drafts on these 341 banks, when, as a matter of fact, after he had drawn those drafts, there were millions and millions of dollars left in these banks that ought to have been drawn out every week; and, as a matter of fact, I will develop that they were not drawn out more frequently than three or four or five weeks or months, instead of weekly, as they should have been drawn.

Continuing to quote:

During the middle months of the year the amounts transferred were in many cases on a 50-50 basis, and instead of drawing on banks weekly and depositing drafts with the treasurer of the State, as provided by law, drafts were drawn at irregular intervals, averaging about 14 or 15 from each bank during the year.

On February 25, 1927, the auditor of the State addressed a communication to the attorney general of the State of Ohio, and among other things, said:

An examination of the reports submitted by my examiners shows that deposits were made in said depositary banks by the deputy registrars throughout the State early in December, 1923, for the 1924 tags, and that the first draft was made on said banks by the secretary of state—

Brown-

on January 22, 1924-

Nearly a month later-for approximately 30 per cent of the amount then on deposit.

I shall not attempt to go into all the details of the audit; but I desire to draw to your attention that part of the report which refers to the moneys deposited in the Union Trust Co. of Cincinnati to the credit of Thad H. Brown, secretary of state, and subject to his order.

The report says:

The account shows that on December 28, 1923, the total deposits up to that time had amounted to $88,294.10, and that no withdrawals were made from said account until January 26, 1924—

In other words, a month later-when there was withdrawn and transferred to the State treasury the sum of $80,000, which was 20.5 per cent of the total balances at that time. The aggregate deposits on that date had amounted to $389,841.98.

This audit was the subject of a newspaper article, which I hold in my hand, appearing in the Columbus Citizen of November 19, 1927. If I remember rightly, this came out about the time of his candidacy for governor. This is a photostatic copy of the Columbus Citizen. It is headed:

Tag-fee interest loss laid to Brown—Examiners hold $69,428 is due State—Former secretary of state and 340 Ohio banks cited for recovery—Say fund held too long—Auditors criticize official for failing to transfer funds weekly.

When Mr. Brown was nominated for a place on the Federal Radio Commission, an article appeared in one of the Ohio papers—I think it was not a very important paper, and so I do not want to overemphasize it—but the fact is that Brown is the candidate not only of the Ohio politicians but of the so-called Wolfe newspaper clique. Wolfe owns several newspapers, and among them, I think, was the Columbus Citizen, but I am not sure of the name of the newspaper. In any event, it is reported, and this paper reported, that Brown was their candidate.

It appears that all parties in Ohio pretty well agreed that Brown would be a good man to have here, because Ohio wants all the influence it can get in Washington. I made inquiry through a personal friend of the office of the secretary of state in Columbus, Ohio, and one of the assistants—I do not care to mention his name—said, "Oh, we are for Brown. We want a couple of radio licenses"—one at Youngstown and one at some college, I think—"and we want all the influence we can get in Ohio. We do not care to say anything about Mr. Brown. We want him."

When Brown was confronted by the Interstate Commerce Committee with these bank accounts, the failure to live up to the law, and the leaving of large amounts in the banks, Brown replied as appears in the testimony, which is printed and on the desks of Senators, on pages 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the hearings. Brown said, on page 9:

It was a physical impossibility to get it in within a week.

I want it understood that I am not charging that Brown got any money out of this thing. I am not charging him with being financially dishonest. I would not want to charge that, because I do not think that would be fair.

The results of this audit and disclosure were responsible for the State securing $55,000 from the banks where Brown allowed the money to remain in excess of the time allowed by law.

After the publication of the audit, which claimed some $69,428, there was a revision of the rates, because, as I remember, the attorney general of the State of Ohio ruled that 2 per cent interest would be a fair rate to charge these banks; and the banks got together, and after computing the balances in each one of the banks at an average of 2 per cent per annum interest the refund to the State was some $55,000.

Now I desire to draw to your attention another thing.

I think Mr. Brown's conduct in Ohio as secretary of state disqualifies him for public office anywhere at any time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator mean on account of the fact that he left the money with the banks a little bit longer than the legal limitation?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is disqualifying, during times of this kind, half the governors of the United States from holding office, because we all know that the conditions have been such that in half the States of the American Union State funds have been left over the legal limit.

Mr. COUZENS. That is not the question. That is not involved in these conditions. Here was a public official required by law to withdraw the funds from the banks weekly and deposit them with the State treasury. He testified before the Interstate Commerce Committee that he did that on every Saturday afternoon. The fact of the audit discloses that he did not withdraw these funds from the State banks every Saturday afternoon.

Mr. LONG. In what year was that?

Mr. COUZENS. The report was made in 1927.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President-

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that on account of the failure of Mr. Brown, when secretary of state, to withdraw the funds from the banks in accordance with law and deposit them with the treasury, there was a recovery on behalf of the State of $55,000. Is that correct? Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. COUZENS. The result of the disclosure was the recovery by the State of $55,000, because had Brown withdrawn these funds as required by law, and as he attempted to convey to the committee that he did, there would have been no interest collected from these 341 banks, but the disclosure required the banks to pay it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And if the disclosure had not been made the State would have lost the $55,000 as a result of Mr. Brown's manner of administering the functions of his office?

Mr. COUZENS. That is entirely correct; yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Did this disclosure take place by reason of the activities of some one wholly dissociated from Mr. Brown's office?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, he did not reveal the facts

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no. The facts did not come out until during the campaign, as I recall, because the testimony shows that the exposé was a surprise to him, and came to him when he was at some dinner, some banquet or other. That, I think, appears in the testimony. The State auditor, whose office is separate from the office of the secretary of state, in auditing Brown's accounts, made this disclosure.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. In order to make it perfectly clear-and I do not mean to deny anything the Senator has said-I should like to call attention to the fact that prior to Mr. Brown's occupying the office these moneys had lain in the banks oftentimes for months; and it was owing to his speeding up of the deposit of the moneys that the whole matter came to the front. It was one of those laws that had just been disregarded.

Mr. COUZENS. No; that is not a correct statement, according to the testimony.

Mr. DILL. That is what the hearings show.

Mr. COUZENS. I am talking about the auditor's records. I did not go back of what the auditor did in his examination of the office of secretary of state under the régime of Brown. This did not happen until Brown's second term; so it could not have been as a result of what happened prior to his incumbency of office.

Mr. DILL. I do not mean that; but I will not take up the Senator's time, other than to say that the point I tried to make clear is that prior to Mr. Brown's coming into office it had been customary not to return to the State treasury for several months the moneys collected in the various parts of Ohio. When Mr. Brown came into office certain registrars or appointees of his predecessor were found guilty of having embezzled money; and that led him to start a system of speedily turning it into the State treasury, and that eventually led to the revival of this law.

Mr. COUZENS. No; where the Senator is wrong is that that did not eventually lead to the discovery of this state of affairs, because it was not discovered until after Brown was in his second term. Brown himself testified before the committee, as an alibi for himself, that prior to his incumbency of the office previous secretaries of State had been more negligent that he had.

Mr. DILL. That is the point.

Mr. COUZENS. That is what I mean. I do not consider that any alibi for Brown.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not care to yield just now.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to point out another thing to show how unreliable Brown is, how evasive he is, and how little we can depend upon his word, or what he says.

When he was before the committee, this took place on page 13 of the hearings. The chairman asked him:

The Chairman. Do you know who the Commercial Air Transport Co. are?

Mr. Brown. No, sir.

The Chairman. Did you ever travel on any of their planes? Mr. Brown. I do not believe I have.

The Chairman. Did you ever travel on any air transport planes that have postal contracts?

Mr. Brown. I do not know which ones have postal contracts. I travel some by plane, but I always pay my own way.

The Chairman. Do you mean to say that you have never had a pass on any of these air transports?

That is, those holding postal contracts.

My reason for particularly bringing that out was that Postmaster General Brown, who is the arch politician of the administration, is the proponent and advocate of this Thad Brown. Mr. Brown answered my question, "No, sir."

This was on February 10, remember. Because of the work of the committee, hearings were delayed until February 26, 16 days later, and then Mr. Brown again appeared before the committee, and I asked him the following questions, which appear on page 42 of the hearing:

The Chairman. As I recall it, during the last hearing you were asked concerning the passes that you had received from aircraft companies handling the United States mail and having contracts with the Post Office States.

Mr. Brown. Yes, sir.

The Charman. Your reply was that you had received no passes from any aircraft company, as I recall. Is that correct?

Now, remember, this was 16 days after he had denied that he had any passes, and in fact emphasized the fact that he paid his way. Mr. Brown said, in reply to my second query 16 days later:

Mr. Brown. I am glad you brought that up, Senator. I would like to refer to page 32 of the record. Your question was:

"Do you mean to say that you have never had a pass on any of these air transports?" My answer was, "No, sir."

In his reply there he left out the statement that he had said he always paid his way. Continuing to quote him, he said:

If the committee got the impression that I had never had a pass, I wish to modify that.

Mind you, he had said before that he always paid his way. Now he wants to modify that, after having it brought up to him 16 days after he had answered.

But the answer as it stands is correct. I said, "No, sir," and you did not follow up with any other questions.

That was his defense for having lied to the committee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hebert in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator mean that Mr. Brown did not answer accurately when he said he had no pass?

Mr. COUZENS. I stated that he had said he always paid his way and that he had no pass. How could he have a pass and always pay his way?

Mr. FESS. He did ride once-

Mr. COUZENS. I am coming to that. I do not want to be interrupted except on what I have already stated.

Mr. FESS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, because I shall take the floor after he has finished.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not want to be anticipated. He said in his testimony that he had paid his way, and he would not have paid his way if he had had a pass.

Mr. FESS. I agree with that; but as the question was whether he had a pass or not, I think that a negative answer would not be subject to criticism.

Mr. COUZONS. I think it would; and I shall develop the testimony later on in connection with that, because after 16 days he stated that he did have a pass twice.

Mr. FESS. He stated that he rode without paying.

Mr. COUZENS. That is like one of the answers of the Senator when he was leaving the White House, and was asked a question by a representative of one of the press associations. I do not see the distinction, myself; perhaps the Senator does.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I came to Washington from Dayton in an airplane, and I did not pay my way. I do not regard that as meaning that I had a pass.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator mean that one has to have a pass of cardboard in order to be passed free over a transportation system?

Mr. FESS. I mean that I was simply a friend of the pilot, who asked me to come, and I came.

Mr. COUZENS. I shall develop that he did have a pass.

Mr. FESS. That is the same way Colonel Brown rode, with a friend; and I do not regard that as a pass.

Mr. COUZENS, I shall develop that he had one on more than one occasion. Of course, if the Senator wants to be technical, perhaps he did not have a piece of cardboard that said "Pass," but he was transported by airplane without a fee.

Mr. FESS. I admit to the Senator that I think the colonel was unfortunate when he said he always paid his way, but I do not think that in his statement that he had not a pass he is subject to criticism.

Mr. COUZENS. When he said he always had paid his way, and had not done so, was not that a misrepresentation?

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is subject to criticism.

Mr. COUZENS. All right. The chairman then said:

You see, that is the weakness of not being a lawyer. If I had been a lawyer, I would have been able to further cross-examine you, because I think your answer is misleading.

Mr. Brown then said:

Well, as I said, I am glad you brought that up, because I had a complimentary passage about a year and a half ago from Washington to New York and return. I had a complimentary passage—

And before he concluded his sentence the chairman said:

Over what line?

Mr. Brown. I think the Ludington Line. I am not sure. And I had a complimentary passage from Chicago to Washington last August, I think it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Over what line?

Mr. Brown. Well, there are two lines involved. From Chicago to Pittsburgh I think it is the Transcontinental and Western Air, and from Pittsburgh into Washington the Pennsylvania Air. The CHARMAN. And they both have post-office contracts? Mr. Brown. I do not know.

In this connection I wish to say that it is a well-known fact, I think generally reputed, that the Ludington Line is the favored line with the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the manner that you got these passes?

I used the word "passes," I want to emphasize to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. Erown. The first one, to New York—I do not recall with whom I conferred regarding it. The second one, from Chicago to Washington, it was through Mr. James E. Kinnison, an attorney in Canton, Ohio. Mr. Kinnison was going to Chicago and asked me to accompany him. I went down to the airport to go, and they were not sending up any ships. I had already made arrangements to take care of some personal matters in Chicago. I took the railroad train to Chicago and came back by air.

Mind you, he said he did not know with whom he had conferred when he got the first "passage." I will put the "age" on the word, so that the Senator from Ohio will not be too technical and say it is not a pass, because it is simply passage.

The Chairman. I understand now that it is only twice that you have-

Mr. Brown (interposing). Those are the only ones that I recall at all, Senator.

He did not say he did not have any more, but that he did not recall; and I confess that I had no documentary evidence as to the extent to which he used these air-transportation lines for free passage. I continue to quote from his answer:

Except, of course, I have gone up in Army planes. As a lieutenant colonel in the Officers' Reserve Corps I am entitled to that.

Senator Wheeler asked Mr. Brown:

What did you mean by your answer the other day to the effect that you did not have any passes?

Mr. Brown replied:

I did not say, Senator, that I did not have any. * * * The question propounded to me by the chairman was, "Do you mean to say that you have never had a pass on any of these air transports?"

My answer was, "No, sir." It is a double negative.

He said that it was a double negative, and he was seeking to get out from under because it was a double negative; but in the previous testimony he had said he always paid his way.

This is just an evidence of the evasiveness, if not absolute dishonesty, of Mr. Brown. From a study of his record I have not been able to find a single constructive or worthwhile thing he has ever done.

At this point I desire to present for the Record a remonstrance sent to me by the Favorite Stove & Range Co., of Piqua, Ohio, with hundreds of names signed to it, protesting against the confirmation of Mr. Brown. I do not know that this is particularly valuable except to show that all of Ohio is not for Mr. Brown.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what reason do the signers assign for their protest?

Mr. COUZENS. The remonstrance is in these words:

We the undersigned do hereby protest most emphatically against the confirmation of Thad Brown being appointed a member of the Federal Radio Commission, and we thank you if you will use your influence in asking the Senate not to confirm him.

I confess that is not very convincing. The letter accompanying the petition is as follows:

I am inclosing a petition, signed by a large number of representative citizens of Piqua, Ohio, who, in this manner, wish to emphatically protest against the appointment of Thad Brown, of this State, as a member of the Radio Commission.

The signers of this petition wish to thank you for the splendid

The signers of this petition wish to thank you for the splendid efforts you are making to prevent the confirmation of Mr. Brown; and while your efforts may not meet with the success so much desired, we assure you that we appreciate the stand you are taking.

JOHN H. FECKER.

In this connection I wish to say that some Senators have received a letter, which, too, is not altogether convincing, from the United Farm Federation of America, protesting against the confirmation because, primarily, they say there should be somebody on the commission representing the farm and labor groups. I wish to present this simply for the

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED FARM FEDERATION OF AMERICA,

Des Moines, Iowa, March 8, 1932.

Dear Senator: Will you please aid us in the present matter now before the Senate—that of the confirmation of Mr. Thad Brown for radio commissioner?

AGAINST

With all due respects to Mr. Brown, he is not the type to represent the public, especially the farm and labor groups, consequently we ask for your support in defeating his appointment.

Every class seems to be represented on the Radio Commission excepting the farm and labor elements, and we urge you to support a candidate who will show the farmer and laborer some consideration. With some one on the commission to represent the farm interests, we could expect some representations for those stations not controlled by the trusts and monopolies. We are mighty tired of the constant chain-station programs out here in Midwest.

One of our representatives has addressed nearly 225,000 people in three months, and is strongly urged to take action against the chain stations

The commission has recently granted WOC-WHO, Davenport and Des Moines stations, 50,000 watts of power and we must all suffer from their type of programs—"chain" programs, while farm matters are barely touched upon. They are also forming an Iowa chain of small stations, all purchased by the Des Moines Register, leading newspaper in the State, which many farmers are not in Senator, can not something be done to stop this deplorable contion? Will you help us by defeating Mr. Brown and demanding an investigation of the Radio Commission? We promise full cooperation.

Yours truly,

United Farm Federation of America, L. A. Loos, President.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I am quite convinced that the President did not desire to appoint Thad Brown, but did so under pressure of his political manipulator, the Postmas-

This protest against the confirmation of Brown is by no means a party issue. These independent commissions are representatives of Congress. They are of great concern to the public, and, so far as I am informed, no independent commission uses its offices to play politics. That, unfortunately, can not be said of the departments in charge of Cabinet officers.

I want to make it plain that there is a clear distinction in my mind between filling a Cabinet office, which is obviously a partisan office, and occupied by a partisan of the administration, whether it be Republican or Democrat, and appointing people to these independent commissions. vigorously resent the filling of these independent commissions with those who are engaged actively in partisan politics. I would take a position similar to that announced by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] the other day, that when such public offices, supported by public moneys, are used for partisan politics, it is indefensible.

Mr. President, this about concludes what I have to say. I recognize that there has been very vigorous propaganda from many sources indorsing the confirmation of Mr. Brown.

I would like to have a record vote, so as to see the extent to which the Senate agrees that it does not approve filling these independent commissions with politicians.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I trust that Senators who have been in the Chamber while the Senator from Michigan has been discussing this nomination will remain until I can make a statement as to certain facts.

The committee heard all the testimony and took a vote on the question as to whether the nomination should be reported favorably, and the vote was 10 to 1 for a favorable report.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The committee did not have before it the testimony concerning the audits of the office of the secretary of state. I do not blame the committee for that. but that testimony was not in the record. I told the committee the audits were available for any members of the committee who desired to look at them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am in a position to make a statement free of any suspicion of having any particular interest in any favor to be given to Col. Thad Brown.

When Colonel Brown was a candidate for Governor of Ohio I did not support him in the primary. I did not decline to support him because I thought he would not make a good executive officer, but he was young and had not had an opportunity to prove himself, and I thought the candidate who was running against him had more maturity, so I declined to support Colonel Brown.

He has trained with what might be known as a political faction which has not always been friendly to me. When Col. Thad Brown's name was presented for the office of chief counsel I was not aggressively for him. Of course, I did not oppose him, because he has the qualifications and education, having been a graduate of the Ohio State University and having a good rank as a student in law; but he had not the long career some lawyers have whom I thought it might have been preferable to nominate. I am mentioning that so it might be understood that what I am saying about Colonel Brown is not because of any personal attachment to him at all

I have known Colonel Brown and know him to be a man of integrity, a man of good character, and I think a splendid business man. While I was not enthusiastic for his appointment to the position as legal head of the Radio Commission, I have been enthusiastic to have him promoted to the Radio Commission, where a business man can be of service. In the matter of his politics he has been aggressive. His father-in-law is one of the leading men of Ohio. He has gone into a family that is identified politically with the State. Naturally, being ambitious, having served in the World War and coming out with a splendid record, he was at once given recognition in the State as an aspiring public official.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us where he served in the World War?

Mr. FESS. I have not looked up his record. He is a World War veteran, identified with World War people.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes. I understand he served in a swivel chair down at Houston, Tex.

Mr. FESS. My friend must admit that the hardest thing that could be said against a young man who wanted to go into the service is that he was put in training and not permitted to go overseas. I have three sons, two of whom were in the service. One went through the drives in France. The other did not get to go overseas, but he was on the sea all the time. The one who suffered was the one who did not get to go overseas. I do not think we ought to criticize a man because he was not over in France.

Mr. COUZENS. I wanted the Senator to make that clear. I did not bring up the World War question.

Mr. FESS. I am speaking of Colonel Brown's position in Ohio.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator brought in his war service. I had it in my notes to bring up the fact that he served in a swivel chair in Houston, but I thought it was not fair, so I did not refer to it. But the Senator was advertising the fact that he was a World War veteran, and I thought I ought to let the Senate know where he served.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator mean that all the men who did not get to go overseas are not World War veterans?

Mr. COUZENS. That is what I mean exactly.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is rather unfair to those boys, because they suffered mentally more than the ones who

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that no man should be criticized because he did not get across to France. But the Senator said, speaking of Mr. Brown, that he served in the World War and had a fine record. I was wondering if he got that record because he did not go over.

Mr. FESS. I am speaking of the recognition that Colonel | Brown received in his own State. For this reason he was elected secretary of state in 1922, taking his office in 1923. The position of secretary of state has its contacts all over the State in every county. One of those contacts is through the distribution of automobile tags. That is not a subject of criticism, because it is for the expedition of distribution and convenience of those seeking tags. For example, in my home town of 1,500 there is a place where our people can go and get their tags by paying the necessary fee without waiting to send the money to Columbus and have the tags sent to them from Columbus. It is required of those who distribute the tags that they deposit the money at once, either sending it directly to Columbus or depositing it in some local bank. That arrangement is always regarded as commendable, because it is intended for the convenience of the individual citizen.

When Mr. Brown came into office he took with him a Colonel Wilson, who was and is now, I believe, commissioner of motor vehicles in charge of issuing licenses. The two men went to different points, including New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Harrisburg, and other places, to study the system of distributing automobile license tags in those sections. Then he set up this plan of establishing distributing offices for the convenience of the people. Soon after this was done there was notification to him that there had been some funds misapplied in the county of Warren, in the town of Lebanon. The funds had been deposited in a bank the cashier of which was a personal friend of mine, who notified Mr. Brown that there was wrong dealing in the use of public money; that the distributor down there had in his possession about $23,000, and had been using that money to buy automobiles to be placed on the floor for exhibition and then sold, and that he was using the public funds for that purpose. Of course it was illegal. The man was apprehended and prosecuted. The money was recovered. Then there was another case reported where there was $45,000 involved, and that was all recovered. Nothing of that sort had been previously divulged. I do not think that that should be charged against Mr. Brown, because the criticism was against the predecessor of Mr. Brown. It appears to be rather a loose way of dealing with these funds.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand it, there is no charge against Brown?

Mr. FESS. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. Charges were made against two of his deputies in connection with the collection of fees, and all that money was actually recovered.

Mr. FESS. This was under a preceding administration, and Mr. Brown undertook to correct the situation. The practice was to sell the tags, and the money was to be deposited in local banks and then at convenient times sent to Columbus. There was an old statute on the books that required public funds coming to any officer to be deposited in the State treasury within a week of their receipt. That is the statute in question. It is an old one. It had not been regarded at all under previous administrations. Col. Thad Brown enforced the sending of the money every two or three weeks. The reason why it was not sent every week was that some places were so far removed from Columbus that it was a physical impossibility to do it. Consequently the thing that is charged against Colonel Brown is that he had not respected that law, which never had been called to the attention of any preceding incumbent of this office.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. I call attention to the fact that when this system of keeping up the depositing of the money was inaugurated it was not inaugurated because somebody called his attention to the statute but for the purpose of getting the money into the State treasury that it might be spent on roads, and I think also for the purpose of preventing any future registrars from depositing money improperly, as they had done before he took office.

Mr. FESS. That is correct.
Mr. DILL. The old statute was never invoked until after he was out of the office of secretary of state and running for governor in 1926.

Mr. FESS. I was coming to that. Colonel Brown became ambitious to become governor. It was charged immediately by the Republicans who wanted somebody else that he was using the office of secretary of state to build a political machine. That charge was made. It can be easily seen that if an official desired to do such a thing he had fairly good opportunity because of his contact in each county through the distribution of automobile tags. That was one way. Secondly, as secretary of state he is at the head of the election board in every county; consequently the Republicans who did not want Colonel Brown promoted to the governorship charged that he was using his office to build a political machine and that all the distributors in the various counties were his lieutenants.

Then this old statute was dug up. Mark you, this was four years after Colonel Brown came into office and when he became a candidate in 1926 for governor. His enemies in his own party charged that he was favoring banks, and that he was favoring them to the extent that he let them keep the money three weeks when the law required it to be sent in each week. The accumulation of this added time involved a loss to the State of something like $70,000 of interest in all of the time covered. That was the charge made. It was made by Mr. Brown's political enemies in his own party and used purely as a campaign issue. It was published in the Columbus Citizen, a copy of which has been exhibited here to-day, a paper that is not, of course, favorable to Colonel Brown. I do not make any charge against the paper, because it is a splendid publication. It does not belong to my party, but it is a high-grade news-

It is out of this situation that the charge was made that he had used the banks and favored them by giving them the opportunity of retaining the money as I have explained. thus depriving the State of the interest that might have been collected, when all there is to it was that he did not demand the money in the banks should be sent to Columbus every week, which in some cases would have been a physical impossibility, and thereby he had lost to the State a considerable amount of interest. All of that was paid back, every bit of it. As soon as it was determined or decided that it was a legitimate claim upon the office, it was made up to the treasury.

I do not think, however, that anyone free-I do not refer to my good friend the chairman of the committee when I say this; I am talking now about people in Ohio who know the situation-I do not believe that anyone in Ohio free from prejudice would seriously on that basis make the charge against Colonel Brown that he was guilty of malfeasance in office. All of this came out of the wash in the political campaign; everything was set right; and nobody in Ohio, so far as I know, is maintaining any opposition to Mr. Brown on that basis.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President-

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Ohio has told us that the whole amount was made good. Will he tell us how it was "made good"?

Mr. FESS. It was made good by collection from the various banks that had held the money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is, the various banks were called upon to pay interest?

Mr. FESS. To pay the additional interest.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How was that accomplished? Mr. FESS. That was accomplished by order of the secretary of state who called upon the banks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By Colonel Brown?

Mr. FESS. By Colonel Brown.

Mr. COUZENS. I think it was by the action of the attor-

Mr. FESS. I think the chairman of the committee is correct. It was done by the attorney general, Mr. C. C. Crabbe; and when the matter was called to the attention of the banks they made payment. These facts were given to us by Colonel Brown on the witness stand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Was suit brought or were the payments made voluntarily?

Mr. FESS. Payments were made voluntarily; there was

So that particular phase of the opposition which is made I do not think had any weight, as I remember, with the committee, except the chairman, and it has had no weight with me, although I have not been one of the partisans of Colonel Brown

In reference to Colonel Brown's political activities, I desire to say he did not seek the position of general counsel of the Radio Commission. I would not be fair to myself or to anyone else if I were to say that Colonel Brown was not desirous of a position under this administration; I know that he was; but as to the particular position of general counsel he was not an applicant for it. When that position became available, and my attention was called to Mr. Brown in connection with it, as I stated before, I was not enthusiastic; in fact. I told his particular friends who asked me about it that he was well enough acquained with the head of the administration without the need of my urging his appointment. I state to Senators that I made no indorsement. I also state to Senators that Col. Thad Brown was not an applicant for that specific position. He was appointed to the position, however, and he set up an organization in the legal division of the Radio Commission that is most creditable. I think everybody who will look into it will have much to say in favor of the manner in which he performed the work of the

When the vacancy occurred in the commission, Colonel Brown said to me that although it would not be much of a promotion, he would like to be promoted to it. A gentleman connected with the Commerce Department in Washington was also a candidate for the position, as was a gentleman from Ohio, a member of the faculty of the Ohio University. Both of them had spoken to me. I said to Colonel Brown, "If you would like this position, I think you have earned it; I will do what I can by way of indorsement," and I indorsed him for the position. I talked with my friend the chairman of the committee about it. He rather doubted the wisdom of the appointment; but I stated to him, "Mr. Brown is a man of integrity, he has a good mind; he is a man of business principles, and it seems to me he has earned this position, and I should like to see him appointed to it."

The President sent his nomination here, although not until after he had conferred with several persons, I think I am justified in saying, including the chairman of the committee himself, although I assume the chairman of the committee advised him otherwise. I have no right to talk about this matter, it being merely a conversation.

The nomination came to the Senate; hearings were held, and a vote was taken.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. COUZENS. I was wondering where Colonel Brown had obtained business experience. I have been unable to find how he obtained the reputation of having been a business success.

Mr. FESS. Colonel Brown is a good business man; he is the owner of a couple of farms [laughter]; he has made some money in the law, and is as good a business man as are most of us who are here. So I do not think he will suffer from any imputation that he is not a good business man. I take him to be a very good business man.

So, Senators, I give it as my honest opinion that Colonel Brown will make an able member of the Radio Commission, who will not, under any circumstances, be unduly influenced by any sordid interests, but will, with an eye to the public weal, do the best he can. That is my honest opinion spoken of a person who has never been a partisan of mine.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I will not take much time of the Senate. I think the chairman of the committee was hardly fair in the implication he drew from reading the testimony of Mr. Brown when he said that he sat in his office every Saturday afternoon and signed drafts on banks prepared for him by Mr. Feight, who was his agent. Mr. Brown at no time said, nor was there any evidence to show, that anybody at that time knew that the law required that these payments should be made every week. This matter was speeded up by Mr. Brown, he stated, in order to get the money into the treasury more rapidly, and in order to prevent the registrars from holding it too long or depositing it in institutions from which they might obtain some private return. Mr. Brown was simply explaining how he wrote the checks. I think it is hardly fair to say that he was lying about it or that he was trying to misrepresent the transaction; but he did say that he had tried to speed up the process, and the reason he did not have the transfers made every week was, as the Senator from Ohio says, that some of the banks were far out and were slow in getting in their returns.

I am not going to discuss the bank question further than to say that previous to Mr. Brown's becoming secretary of state the testimony shows that the money was allowed to remain in the banks sometimes for three or four months after it was deposited, but, as the result of Mr. Brown's improving and speeding up the process, the money was gotten in more quickly; and when the attorney general dug up the old statute the State got $65,000 in interest.

I think it is only fair to say that the members of the committee who heard Mr. Brown felt that there was no basis for any charge that could be possibly placed against him as to his honesty or his service to the State of Ohio in this matter; and I do not think that the record bears out any claim but that he did everything a man could properly do in that regard.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan said, in opening his remarks, and he repeated it all the way through, that he based his opposition primarily on the fact that Mr. Brown was a politician. As I said to the Senator in committee, and I repeat here, so are we all politicians. If men are to be barred from commissions because they may have been politicians none of us would be eligible at all. In that statement is the implication that Mr. Brown is the kind of politician that if placed in a semijudicial or semiadministrative position as a commissioner his political proclivities will influence and affect his actions as a member of the commission. Of course, if he is the type of man who will allow his political proclivities, his political activities, to cause him to be unfair in the decision of questions before the commission, that is a valid objection. There is no way to determine that except by the study of his record while he has been general counsel for

There is nothing shown in the hearings, and there is no charge made by anybody to the effect, that as general counsel his political opinions have ever at any time influenced his legal judgment or his legal advice. As general counsel he has done a real service to the Radio Commission. When he took charge of it it was largely unorganized, and by "unorganized" I mean members of the legal staff were assigned to certain cases that happened to come up without any particular system. Mr. Brown proceeded to organize the legal division into an examining division, on the one side, and into a division that handled appeals on the other. He assigned certain attorneys to look after the examining end of the work, and he assigned certain other attorneys to look after the appeals. The record made by the general counsel's office since he took charge of it is the best that has been made by any general counsel who had served the Radio Commission.

I was also concerned somewhat as to the charges that if he became a commissioner, he would be subject to influence by those organizations which, in my judgment, already have too much power and control over radio and are seeking for more. I refer particularly to the Radio Corporation of America and its affiliated companies. We happen to have a definite case in which Mr. Brown's position is shown in a | peatedly-I can not take very seriously a slip of the tongue matter that was of the highest importance to the Radio Corporation. I do not cite it as proof that he is against the Radio Corporation, but I do cite it as proof that he is not afraid to take a position when he thinks it is right, even though it is in defiance of that great radio organization.

Last summer when the question of whether or not section 13 of the radio act applied to clause 9 of the Radio Corporation agreement the matter came up to the commission and was referred to Mr. Brown as general counsel. He tells us in his testimony that he called all the attorneys of the legal division into his office as a cabinet and they went over it and discussed it very carefully; that there was a division of opinion among the attorneys, but it was his own personal judgment that the law did apply to the Radio Corporation agreement. He so stated to the commission and advised them that it was their duty to refuse the licenses applied for by the Radio Corporation as being guilty of monopoly; but he pointed out that it was a doubtful question on which men disagreed, and he, therefore, thought it might be well to make a test case, as it involved such vast investments on the part of the Radio Corporation; and he recommended that a test case be presented to the Supreme Court of the United States to determine whether or not the law did apply. In the face of that advice the commission overrode him and, by a vote of three to two, refused to declare that the law applied to the Radio Corporation's agreement.

I mention that because the charge has been frequently made, not on the floor but while this nomination has been pending, that Mr. Brown would be the creature of the Radio Corporation; and the record of the commission has been such that I have been particularly concerned that no man should be appointed whom I thought was subject to the influence of that organization.

I do not hold any brief for Mr. Brown. I do not know how he will vote; but the charges made against him certainly have not been sustained. His record is that of an honest man, that of a clean man; and I believe, if he is confirmed. he will make a capable member of the commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator give us his view about the other feature of the testimony to which our attention was called by the Senator from Michigan-Mr. Brown's riding on passes from airplane companies having mail contracts?

Mr. DILL. I was present when the first question was asked, and I was present when Mr. Brown came back; and I think the language of the Senator from Ohio explains my views. Probably it was an unfortunate statement, but I do not believe it was willful; and there was no showing that anything had happened except that he had ridden two or three times with some friend on the airplane. He had no pass, as such, that entitled him to ride whenever he wanted to, in the sense that a pass is generally understood to entitle a man to ride.

Mr. SMITH. It was just a complimentary ride.

Mr. DILL. The Senator from South Carolina suggests that it was a complimentary ride, and I think that is true. I can not believe that Mr. Brown would have willfully misrepresented the matter. I could not consider it a very serious mistake in his testimony.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. The statement that was made mentioned the Ludington Line, which would indicate that that line might have been favored by the Post Office Department. That was the inference I received.

Mr. DILL. The Ludington Line, as I understand, does not carry mail; does it?

Mr. FESS. No. The truth about the matter is that the Ludington Line has no mail contract.

Mr. DILL. But one of the other lines does. Even if it did, however, I do not think that is such a serious thing. In the light of the man's record as an honest man all through these years—a man who has held positions of trust reor even an oversight of that kind.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not his impression that when the question was raised as to whether the statement was contradictory of Mr. Brown's first testimony he then specified what time he did go and the occasion, and it was a mere casual trip at the invitation of a friend and did not involve what is usually termed a pass—that is, one given to entitle a man to go when he pleases and at such time as he pleases?

Mr. DILL. I think that is correct.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that when the matter was up one of the members of the committee said that that was an unfortunate statement for Mr. Brown to make, because while it may have been absolutely honest it was somewhat misleading.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Does the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] is out of the Chamber.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The Senator from Michigan is absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is, Does the Senate advise and consent to this nomination? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it. The Senate advises and consents to the nomination.

The clerk will state the next nomination on the Executive Calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney, western district of North Caro-

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have some day fixed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Schall] to consider the Jonas nomination, if that is agreeable.

Mr. BAILEY. What day would the Senator, suggest? Mr. McNARY. Would the Senator from Minnesota like to suggest any particular date that would suit his convenience for considering the nomination of Mr. Jonas?

Mr. SCHALL. Any day is satisfactory to me. Mr. McNARY. Let us take it up now, then.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; let us take it up now and get through with it.

Mr. McNARY. I am advised by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Schall] that he promised to notify some persons in North Carolina who wish to be here, and he would rather not take up the nomination to-day because of a promise outstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, all postmasters' nominations on the calendar will be confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suppose automatically we return to legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not automatically.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Oregon if any arrangement has been made with respect to the time when the Jonas nomination shall be taken up?

Mr. McNARY. A conference is being held at this moment on that, and the Senate will be notified in a few moments.

I move that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As in legislative session-

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon vield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

ALBERT F. HARRIS

Mr. ODDIE. As in executive session, I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the nomination of Mr. Albert F. Harris, of North Dakota, was confirmed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the action on the nomination of Mr. Harris will be reconsidered, and the name will be returned to the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that the nomination be sent back to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I am waiting for the Senate to go out of executive session.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

CHARLES A. JONAS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, pending that motion, I would like to inquire why the Senate does not proceed with its program and dispose of the Jonas case? It has been pending here on the calendar for a long time, and we had an arrangement that it would be taken up this afternoon; but now, without any explanation of the matter, we are receding, in practical effect, from the program.

Mr. McNARY. No, Mr. President; the Senator has not read the Record of yesterday. I stated specifically yesterday that we would consider the Bradley case and the Brown case to-day, and then return to legislative session to consider the unfinished business. I am ready to announce now that we are unable to go forward with the Jonas case because of the absence of some friends from North Carolina who desire to be here, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Schall] feels that we should not go forward for that reason.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senate is waiting for friends of the nominee who are not Members of the Senate? Is that the practice of the Senate? What is the object? They have no voice in the determination of this matter.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Minnesota stated that he would notify some people in North Carolina interested in this matter in time to be here. He wants to carry out that promise. There is now an agreement entered into by the Senator from Minnesota and the Senators from North Carolina that the matter may come up Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock, if that is agreeable to the other Members of the

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if it is agreeable to the Senators from North Carolina, I shall certainly not object; but I do protest against the practice of arranging the business of the Senate, particularly executive business, to suit the convenience of persons who may desire to come here and exert influence on Senators in connection with a nomination.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is not a fair statement. Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is a fair statement, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Schall] is entitled to the consideration meted out to all Senators. As a matter of courtesy to him, such as would be extended to the able and distinguished Senator from Arkansas, he is entitled to notify people who are interested of the date to which this matter may be postponed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not concede that at all. I do not concede that private citizens are entitled to know when the Senate is to take up a nomination which has been pending before the Senate for a considerable length of time. I am not saying anything discourteous to the Senator from Minnesota. The Senator from Oregon has no occasion to attempt to lecture me. I do feel that the Senate ought to proceed with this nomination, unless there is a substantial reason for deferring it, and I do not think it is a substantial reason that the Senator from Minnesota desires to notify some private citizens that the Senate on a future occasion will take up the nomination. If the Senator from Oregon wishes to commit himself to that practice and policy, he is at liberty to do so, but he can not commit me to it.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Oregon will follow his own judgment in matters of that kind, always with courtesy.

Mr. President, I ask, if it is agreeable to the Senators involved, that this matter be set for 3 o'clock Tuesday.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement in justice to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson].

When it appeared that the consideration of the appointment had gone over, and the Senator from Oregon asked me if we would agree upon a date, I did agree that it might go over until the next executive session, which will be next Tuesday, as I understand it. However, that agreement was made under the impression that the consideration of the nomination at this time had already been put over. If it is not to be put over, I would much prefer to go ahead. On the other hand, I do not wish to be put in the position of taking any advantage of anybody in this matter.

Mr. McNARY. I understand the Senator very clearly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Any agreement into which the Senator from North Carolina wishes to enter is satisfactory to me; but after the Senate has, as I understand, had this nomination on the calendar for several weeks or months, I do not wish to commit the Senate to the practice or policy of postponing the consideration of its business in order that private citizens may be notified and have an opportunity to come here and exert what pressure they can on Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next at 3 o'clock the Senate, in executive session, shall proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney for the western district of North Carolina. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to ask a question: Has a motion already been agreed to that we return to legislative session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That had been agreed to; but by unanimous consent the vote was reconsidered, and we are once more in executive session.

Mr. LONG. May I ask further, Do both Senators from North Carolina consent that we should put this nomination off for this afternoon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is just asking, Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to be perfectly fair about this matter. If there is any substantial reason offered by the Senator from Minnesota, or by the Senator from Oregon, for this matter going over, I will consent to it; but if there is no reason other than the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota notifying certain unknown citizens of North Carolina, who could not affect the matter, who would probably come here, to put it in as mild a way as possible, as spectators-if there is nothing more substantial than that on which to base the postponement, I would much prefer to go ahead. If in offering an objection I am put in the position of treating anyone unfairly or taking any undue advantage, I will certainly not offer an objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was told some days ago, although I had not known of the matter, that some arrangement had been made to take up the nomination this afternoon. I was a member of the subcommittee to which the nomination was referred, and was prepared to address the Senate on the subject this afternoon very briefly. I would like to go on with this nomination.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was my understanding, Mr. President, that there was a tentative agreement to proceed with all these nominations to-day.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no feeling in the matter at all. I know nothing about the case. The Senator from Minnesota stated to me that he desired to defer it until some day next week to suit his convenience, and it is the usual practice under such circumstances to set a definite day. I have asked that we set 3 o'clock Tuesday, which I thought was agreeable to the Senators from North Carolina and met with the convenience and pleasure of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask the Senator whether there was an agreement that the matter should be taken up to-day?

Mr. McNARY. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Oregon to ask me if I had any objection to taking up all these cases, the three cases, two that have been disposed of and the case now before the Senate. I stated that I had no objection. I did not urge any unanimous-consent agreement in the open Senate. Perhaps it would have been better to have had a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am trying to observe the rules. I understood the Senator from Oregon to have the floor. I have been trying for some time to get recognition, during which time four or five Senators have taken the floor apparently in their own right. If that is the only way to get recognition, I shall have to pursue that course also.

I would like to have the Senator from Oregon yield to me so that I can get a legal right to say what I want to say.

Mr. McNARY. I am very happy to yield to the Senator. Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not on the same side of this question as the Senator from Minnesota, but I do not believe we ought to go behind the Senator's motive. It seems to me the request he makes is reasonable. I have inquired several times to-day, of two or three different Senators, as to whether the Jonas case was to come up today, and I have been told every time that it was not. I do not think there was any understanding that it was to come up to-day. If the Senator from Minnesota, regardless of what his reason is, wants it to go over until Tuesday, and nobody is to be injured by the postponement, I do not see why we should not agree to that and let it go over until

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next at 3 o'clock the Senate, in executive session, proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney for the western district of North Carolina. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I desire to state that I did not intend to object, nor did I desire to be put in the position of affirmatively being a party to the postponement; but when my colleague entered into negotiations to name a future day when this matter might be taken up, we understood the Senate had postponed it.

I do not want to object to the postponement, and yet I do not want it to be done as a matter of agreement between the Senators from North Carolina. Because I had a bad cold one day, and asked that the Jonas case be put over until the next day, I have been criticized in the press of North Carolina with having endeavored, in connection with my colleague, to get the matter postponed. I never asked to have it postponed then. My colleague did, with clear motives, thinking that I would be here the next day, as I was. I had returned to Washington after making a speech the night before, and, having a bad cold, was confined to my bed that day. Yet we were scolded by some of Mr. Jonas's partisans in North Carolina for having, almost by trickery, had the matter postponed. Now the advocates of Mr. Jonas's confirmation ask that the nomination be postponed. We do not object. That is all.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am not particular about what we do, but on behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] I think a statement should be made. I believe there is some misunderstanding. When we adjourned yesterday only a few Senators were in the Chamber, and I want to read from the RECORD what took place.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. From what page is the Senator about to read?

Mr. FESS. From page 6331, at the top of the second column, the middle of the paragraph. This is what occurred, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] speaking:

At the conclusion of the executive session this evening it is my purpose to move a recess as in executive session, and the purpose to move a recess as in executive session, and the Senator from New York and I have agreed to take up at 12 o'clock to-morrow the matters concerning the nomination of Mr. Bradley. Following thereafter, it is agreed with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Couzens] that he may follow with the matter of the nomination of Mr. Thad H. Brown to be a member of the Federal Radio Commission.

Mr. King. Following that, Mr. President—

Mr. Maylory Evolutions that I assume that the Senator from

Mr. McNary. Following that, I assume that the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] will desire to have the Senate return to legislative session in connection with the appropriation bill which has recently been made the unfinished business

I recall very distinctly that that was the statement the Senator from Oregon made, and I was wondering whether there was not some misunderstanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have stated that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] approached me and asked if I had any objection to taking up the nominations. I understood him to include the Jonas nomination. I did not hear the statement that he subsequently made in the Senate; but, of course, as I formerly said, it is better to have these understandings in the open Senate. This is not in pursuance of a unanimous-consent agreement.

My point is that while I have no objection to the Senate taking any course about the matter that it wishes, I do not think we may be precluded from proceeding to the consideration of the nomination merely because a Senator has stated that he would give private citizens notice when the case is to be taken up in the Senate. I believe that is a bad precedent. I do not think it involves any question of courtesy to Senators to deny that practice. I think it is a bad practice, and one which would embarrass the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sure the Chair did not do it deliberately, but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] was trying to catch the eye of the Chair to secure recognition in order to make some statement and give his reasons for asking for postponement, and probably to take the Senate into his confidence with regard to the names of the gentlemen in North Carolina who desire to be heard. I merely call that to the attention of the Chair so he may now recognize the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will grant recognition to any Senator who rises and asks for it. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understand that we have returned to legislative business now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to state his understanding of the sequence of events. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] moved that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business. The Chair proceeded to put that question, but before being able to announce that it had been agreed to, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] took the floor, and therefore we are still in executive session. If the Senator from Washington wishes to move the resumption of legislative business, of course that is in order.

Mr. JONES. If it is necessary to make that motion, I-now make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is necessary in order that the Senate may resume legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall not object to the motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed legislative session.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives has presented a practically unanimous report in favor of Philippine independence.

There is a difference in time in the Senate bill and the House bill, but the philosophy of the bills is much the same.

As this whole subject of independence will soon be debated in the Senate, I ask permission to have inserted in the body of the Record the very illuminating, scholarly, and complete report made by the House committee. I also request that the report be referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Like the Senate report, the House finds that a condition of uncertainty exists regarding both Philippine interests and American interests which should be solved by this Congress.

As the debate proceeds, I feel sure that the information contained in this report will be valuable to all the Members of the Senate and the American people.

There being no objection, the report was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Hare, from the Committee on Insular Affairs, submitted

Mr. HARE, from the Committee on Insular Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 7233):

Your Committee on Insular Affairs, to whom were referred several bills looking to the independence of the Philippine Islands, having considered the same, favorably report H. R. 7233, with an amendment, and recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

BASIC FACTS

A careful analysis of the Philippine question and of all the evidence submitted at the hearings held before the committee discloses the following facts:

1. When the United States, as a result of the war with Spain, assumed sovereignty over the Philippine Islands it disclaimed any intention to colonize or exploit them.

intention to colonize or exploit them.

2. In pursuance of such lofty purpose the United States, through Executive pronouncements and a formal declaration made by the Congress in 1916, pledged itself to grant independence to the Philippines. The only condition precedent imposed by the Congress was the establishment of a stable government.

3. It is believed that a stable government now exists in the Philippines; that is, a government capable of maintaining order, administering justice, performing international obligations, and supported by the suffrages of the people.

4. Every step taken by the United States since the inception of American sovereignty over the Philippines has been to prepare the Filipine people for independence. As a result, they are now ready filipino people for independence. As a result, they are now ready for independence politically, socially, and economically.

5. The American farmer is urging protection from the unrestricted free entry of competitive Philippine products.

6. American labor is seeking protection from unrestricted immigration of Filipino laborers, especially at this time of widespread unemployment.

7. The solution of the Philippine problem can no longer be costponed, without injustice to the Filipino people and serious injury to our own interests.

8. Any plan for Philippine independence must provide for a satisfactory adjustment of economic conditions and relationships. The present free-trade reciprocity between the United States and the Philippines was established by the American Congress against the opposition of the Filipino people. The major industries of the islands have been built on the basis of that arrangement. This trade arrangement can not be terminated abruptly without injuring both American and Philippine economic interests.

Your committee held extended hearings at which the representatives of the various groups concerned appeared. Every pe who asked to be heard was accorded an opportunity to testify.

AMERICAN POLICY PROMISE OF INDEPENDENCE

There is little need for argument to justify the grant of independence to the people of the Philippines. We stand committed to the duty of making them free. At the very outset of our occupation of the islands (in 1898) President McKinley proclaimed the purpose of their acquisition and forecast their destiny. "The Philippines are ours," he said, "not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to a mighty trust committed to us."

mighty trust committed to us."

Still later, at a time when the American people had heard a year's discussion of our intentions and plans regarding the islands, President McKinley voiced the hope that the first Philippine commission would be accepted by the Filipinos as bearers of "the richest blessings of a liberating rather than a conquering nation."

In January, 1908, President Roosevelt said in his message to Congress:

In January, 1906, 1700.

Congress:

"* * The Filipino people, through their officials, are therefore making real steps in the direction of self-government. I hope and believe that these steps mark the beginning of a course which will continue till the Filipinos become fit to decide for themselves whether they desire to be an independent nation. * * ""

In 1913 President Wilson, in a message to the Filipino people, said:

We regard ourselves as trustees acting not for the advantage of the United States but for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands. Every step we take will be taken with a view to ultimate independence of the islands and as a preparation for that independence.

Similar statements of our Government's intent to help the Filipinos achieve separate, independent nationhood are to be found in official utterances of the Presidents of the United States from 1898 to the present.

In 1916 the Congress of the United States, in the preamble of the Jones Act, declared:

"Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

"Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete inde-

Nearly 16 years have passed since the enactment of this act. More than 10 years have elapsed since President Wilson certified to the Congress that the condition precedent for the granting of independence has been fulfilled.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Filipino people are the beneficiaries of several centuries of civilization. Long before the Spanish conquest of the islands in the latter half of the sixteenth century, the inhabitants possessed a certain degree of culture, including written languages, characteristic arts, and industries. They maintained commerce with the mainland of Asia. This civilization and culture were like the mainland of Asia. This civilization and culture were, like the people themselves, of Malay origin, but with Indonesian and Mongolian elements.

Spanish occupation of the islands for more than three centuries introduced and established Christianity, European juris-prudence, language, and customs. It centralized authority and tended thereby to unify the country. However, economic progress tended thereby to unify the country. However, economic progress during the first two centuries of Spain's dominion was slow. The spread of democracy in Europe and America in the late decades of the eighteenth and the early years of the nineteenth century—largely as a result of the American Revolution—influenced the fortunes and the outlook of the Filipinos. From 1807 to 1872—a stretch of 65 years—there were 11 native revolts against Spanish rule. These testify to the sense of nationalism and the longing for self-grayerment of the Filipino people.

rule. These testify to the sense of nationalism and the longing for self-government of the Filipino people.

The interval from 1872 to 1896—24 years—was a period of preparation for the more decisive struggles of later years. In 1896 Jose Rizal, the leading Filipino patriot, was executed. Scon afterwards the Katipunan, a revolutionary association, with Andres Bonifacio at its head, started a nation-wide revolt.

The outcome was a solemn agreement binding the Spanish authorities to institute reforms, among them improvements in the judicial system, Filipino representation in the Spanish Cortes at Madrid, separation of church and state, and in general a larger measure of autonomy for the islands. This agreement included a stipulation that Aguinaldo and other leaders should expatriate themselves. themselves.

a stipulation that Aguinaldo and other leaders should expatriate themselves.

The Spaniards failed to execute the agreement they had made. In consequence, the Filipinos, under the leadership of Gen. Francisco Macabulos, renewed the revolt and established a provisional government. In April, 1898, when the United States declared war, the Filipinos were in active rebellion against Spain. At the suggestion of Admiral Dewey, in May, 1898, Aguinaldo, who was then in Hong Kong, returned to Manila as an ally of the Americans. With the aid of the American military authorities he succeeded in wresting the islands, with the exception of Manila, from the Spanish forces. Manila itself was captured on August 13, 1898, upon the arrival of the American Army.

From the occupation of Manila until more than a year after the treaty of Paris had transferred the islands to the United States, the government there was purely military. For nine months—September 1, 1900, to June, 1901—the islands were governed by the Taft Commission and the United States Army. The commission exercised legislative powers, but the executive authority was lodged in the military. This arrangement was supplanted in June, 1901, by civil government when William Howard Taft, president of the commission, was inaugurated as the first civil governor. The establishment of civil government throughout the islands was delayed because of native resistance to American control, which started with the outbreak of hostilities between Filipino forces and the American Army on February 4, 1899.

FROGRESS IN SELF-GOVERNMENT

PROGRESS IN SELF-GOVERNMENT

In 1901 the Filipinos were given control of municipal govern-In 1901 the Filipinos were given control of municipal governments. Beginning in 1903 the people of the Provinces were permitted to elect the provincial governors. At first the two members who, with the governor, constituted the provincial board were appointive officials, but they, too, were soon made elective. In 1907, under the provisions of the Cooper Act, the first elective assembly was inaugurated. The legislature was then composed of this elective assembly as its lower house and a commission appointed by the President of the United States as the upper house, whose presiding officer was the Governor General. The share of the Filipino people in the government was still further enlarged in 1913, when a majority of Filipinos was appointed to the commission. This, for practical purposes, gave the Filipinos control of the legislature.

the commission. This, for practical purposes, gave the Filipinos control of the legislature.

Under the Jones law, passed in 1916, the Philippine people were given a very large and important participation in their government. To a great measure the government of the islands was placed in their hands. This active, responsible part in making and administering their laws and in conducting their other public affairs has been for them a practical apprenticeship in self-government.

The act provided for an elective senate and house of representatives as the legislative department of the insular government. The Governor General ccased to be the presiding officer of the upper house, but continued as the chief executive official. Though the Governor General is the chief executive official, the executive departments perform all executive functions. The secretaries of these departments are all, with the exception of the vice governor, Filipinos, appointed by the Governor General upon the recommendation of the party in power in the legislature, and confirmed by the Philippine Senate. The vice governor is secretary of the department of making interactions.

department of public instruction.

A notably useful institution is the council of state, created some 14 years ago. Members of the council are chosen by the Governor General. Thus far the secretaries of the various departments and the presiding officers and the majority leaders of the two houses of the legislature have constituted its member-ship, under the chairmanship of the Governor General. The council acts in an advisory capacity and has served to reconcile divergent views of the executive and the legislature with reference to fundamental questions of policy. Governors General have recorded their indebtedness to the council of state for its helpful cooperation.

POLITICAL PARTIES AND ELECTIONS

Political parties are not merely organs for the expression of hopes, proposals, and demands with respect to government; they are also measures of the popular capacity to understand and differentiate political, economic, and moral issues. Still more are they a test of a people's fitness for self-government if they stand for the sanctity of the ballot and insure full acquiescence in the will of the majority hopestly and unwestly expressed.

for the sanctity of the ballot and insure full acquiescence in the will of the majority honestly and unmistakably expressed.

There are at present but two political parties in the Philippines. They have existed for a good many years—one of them dates from 1907. They differ as to principles and policles of government, but they are at one on the question of independence. Their contests for victory at the polls have at times been marked by warmth and vigor, but the elections have always been orderly. The Wood-Forbes report, quoted at the hearings, described the elections of 1919 as "without any serious disturbance," and declared that there was a "general acceptance by the minority of the result of the popular vote." This finding of the Wood-Forbes commission is true of other elections.

At the last general elections (1931) there were 1,009,125 voters

At the last general elections (1931) there were 1,009,125 voters registered. Of these 983,406 (about 90 per cent) cast their ballots. At no election, the testimony showed, has the proportion of voters to registration been less than 80 or 85 per cent. These statistical facts illustrate the popular interest in the insular elec-statistical facts illustrate the popular interest in the insular elections and in the issues at stake.

At present there is only male suffrage in the islands and this is limited to certain classes. A male 21 years of age, who is able to read and write Spanish, English, or any of the native dialects; or who owns property of an assessed value of 500 pesos or more; or who pays an annual tax of at least 30 pesos; or who held one of the so-called municipal offices during the Spanish dominion is entitled to vote. There is now a movement to enfranchise Filipino women, and a bill granting them suffrage is pending in the Philippine Senate, having already passed the house. This proposal to add women to the electorate is taken as additional evidence of the people's appreciation of their civic duties and responsibilities. people's appreciation of their civic duties and responsibilities.

POPULAR EDUCATION

Popular education is everywhere and always a stimulus and as sistance to popular interest and participation in government. The Filipino people, as evidence submitted to the committee attested, are eager for education and willing to expend large sums on their are eager for education and willing to expend large sums on their schools of every level. In September, 1929, there were 9,063 schools in the islands, an increase of approximately 7,000 schools since we obtained possession of the islands. Of these 8,442 were public schools. Enrolled in these schools, public and private, were 1,316,126 students. The public schools are staffed by 28,519 supervisors, principals, and teachers, all but about 300 of whom are Filipinos. The annual expenditure for public education in the Philippines for 1932 will represent almost 30 per cent of the government's income. The whole cost of this public education is paid by the people of the islands. paid by the people of the islands.

Included in this great educational establishment, public and private, are four universities of high academic standard. One of these, that of Santo Thomas, in Manila, was founded in 1611, or 25 years before Harvard University. Some 19,500 young men and young women are preparing themselves at these universities for the professions. Many others are attending the normal schools for the teaching profession. Many Pilipinos are also attending colleges and universities in America and other countries. In all the schools of the islands, primary, secondary, and higher, the language of instruction is English.

HEALTH AND SANITATION

Many agencies and institutions, both preventive and curative, are at work to combat disease and promote health among the Filipino people. Sanitation was one of the first concerns of the American Government in the Philippines. Progress in this regard has been steady in all parts of the islands. For the last 15 years the health service has been administered almost wholly by Filipinos. The present director of the bureau is a Filipino, as are nearly all of his 522 medical and 2,083 lay assistants. In 1930 there were 105 hospitals of all types in the islands. One of them (in Manila) was founded in 1596 and is the oldest institution of its kind in the Far East.

The Secretary of War in 1930 reported that "health conditions its kind in the Far East.

The Secretary of War in 1930 reported that "health conditions were in general good."

As a proof and a measure of the effectiveness of the work accomplished for health and sanitation, official statistics for the year 1930 were adduced in testimony on this subject. They showed the birth rate to be 38.65 per 1,000 and the mortality to be 22.78 per 1,000. The success of the Philippine Health Service in treating and eradicating leprosy has attracted widespread attention. The leprosarium at Culion has been visited by medical scientists of many countries and is one of the leading institutions of its kind. Here again, as in the case of education and other activities of the government, the cost is paid by the Filipino people.

CIVIL SERVICE

In the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the insular establishment proper, in the provincial and municipal offices, including Manila and Baguio, there were on December 31, 1930, some 21,700 civil-service employees. All but 461 of these were Filipinos. Of the Americans remaining in the service, nearly all are teachers. In the office of the Governor General there are 35 Filipino civil employees.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Interesting and significant facts regarding the administration of justice in the islands were presented in oral testimony and in official statistics received by the committee. The judicial system of omicial statistics received by the committee. The judicial system of the islands includes a supreme court, 28 courts of first instance in as many different districts, and 865 justices of the peace. There are one or more judges for each of the 28 district courts. Thirty-one auxiliary judges assist these district judges. All the justices of the peace and all the district judges save two are Filipinos. Until 1913 the judges of the supreme court numbered 9, 5 Americans and 4 Filipinos.

The Philippine attorney general's report for 1930 gives the information that the courts of first instance disposed of a total of 14,265 civil cases and 6,823 criminal cases in that year. Of the criminal cases, 5,888 resulted in convictions and 935 in dismissals. Breaches of the law in the Philippines, the testimony indicated, are relatively few. About 7,000 convictions for violations of statutes and municipal ordinances are recorded each year. The number of persons confined in prisons is about 8,000.

PUBLIC ORDER

Law and order are maintained throughout the islands by the Law and order are maintained throughout the islands by the Philippine constabulary and the local police forces. The constabulary is an organization of 7,000 members, practically all of whom are Filipinos, and is supported exclusively by the insular government. It is efficient and reliable. The Wood-Forbes commission, in its report to the President in 1922, said:

"They (the Filipinos) are naturally an orderly law-abiding people. The constabulary has proved itself to be dependable and thoroughly efficient."

INSULAR CURRENCY

The soundness of Philippine currency was persuasively demonstrated at the hearings. On December 31, 1930, the total net circulation of insular currency was P108,000,000. The several forms of this currency and the amount of each were: Treasury certificates, $\mathbb{P}71,000,000$; Philippine silver coin, $\mathbb{P}20,000,000$; bank notes, $\mathbb{P}16,000,000$. By way of guaranty for this circulation there was as of October 31, 1931, a gold-standard fund of $\mathbb{P}38,000,000$ divided thus: $\mathbb{P}10,000,000$ in Philippine currency and $\mathbb{P}7,000,000$ in United States currency deposited in the Philippine treasury, and $\mathbb{P}20,-000,000$ in gold currency in several Federal reserve banks in the United States. United States.

The law of 1903 requires that the gold-standard fund shall be at all times not less than 15 per cent nor more than 25 per cent of the total or available circulation of Philippine currency. The #38,000,000 gold-standard reserve is therefore #16,000,000 in excess of the legal requirement on the basis of actual circulation.
The treasury certificates in circulation on December 31, 1930.

The treasury certificates in circulation on December 31, 1930, were backed, more than dollar for dollar, by a reserve taking the form of American currency and held in Federal reserve banks in the United States. On the date given this reserve was P81,000,000—that is, P10,000,000 larger than the aggregate of treasury certificates. In addition to this reserve there are P13,000,000 in the treasury of the Philippine Islands behind these certificates. Of this sum, P3,700,000 is in American currency, the rest in Philippine silver coins.

It was pointed out that the operation of the act of 1903 requiring these protective reserves behind the Philippine currency makes it one of the most dependable currencies in the world to-day. While there is no provision for gold reserves in the islands, an equivalent is supplied by the backing of gold currency in the United States. The stability of the Philippine currency is thus made as safe and stable as American currency. The fact that despite the present depression Philippine currency remains at par with the American gold dollar is evidence of its soundness.

NATIONAL WEALTH AND TRADE

The Secretary of War reports that in 1930 the trade of the Philippines with the United States and foreign countries aggregated P512,520,162, a decrease of about 17.8 per cent from that of 1929. The insular collector of customs, in his report, gives the value of imports as P266,334,255. The balance of trade in favor of the islands was P20,148,348. The bulk of the overseas trade was with the United States. The total of this was P367,050,179 and its proportion of the entire foreign commerce of the islands 72 per cent. Of the whole volume of trade with the United States P156,-366,057 represents imports and P210,684,122 exports. The balance in favor of the islands, accordingly, was P54,318,065.

Since 1909, when free trade with the United States was established, the insular trade with the United States has risen from P10,576,682, equal to 16 per cent of their entire foreign commerce, to #367,050,179, or 72 per cent in 1930.

Sugar, coconut oil, cordage, and tobacco were the principal exports to the United States, and these have been growing steadily in volume. They come to the United States duty free.

in volume. They come to the United States duty free.

It is natural that the domestic industries and foreign commerce of the islands should enlarge in keeping with the increase in population. There were only 4,500,000 Filipinos in 1866 and about 7,500,000 in 1898. The Philippines are rich in many products which the world needs. The national wealth is estimated at P5,905,085,000 (1927), or P478 per capita. If independence be bestowed on them, the Filipino people will begin their separate existence with a greater patrimony than was possessed by many of the peoples who recently have joined the ranks of sovereign nations.

INSULAR BUDGET

At a time of universal depression, when most nations, large and small, are beset with fiscal difficulties, the government of the Philippines is in a sound financial condition. This statement is corroborated by the report of the insular auditor. From the exhibits left with the committee it appears that the Philippines not only have succeeded in balancing their budget but have in fact accumulated a surplus. Even in 1932, and in the face of curtailment of revenues, the Philippine budget will be balanced without increased taxation or abandonment of essential government services. The budgetary system was adopted in the Philippine Islands before it became operative here.

before it became operative here.

It was urged by the proponents of independence in the presentation of their views to the committee that this wise stewardship of the insular revenues evidences the ability of the Filipinos to manage one of the most difficult departments of government in one of the worst financial dislocations of recent years.

THE NATIONAL DEBT

The present outstanding bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands is $\mathbb{P}$170,000,000, as against which there has already been built up a sinking fund of $\mathbb{P}$50,000,000, now on deposit in American banks. This leaves a net outstanding indebtedness of $\mathbb{P}$120,ican banks. This leaves a net outstanding indebtedness of P120,-000,000. The present national debt is but 48 per cent of the bonded-debt limit fixed by the Congress of the United States, and the evidence submitted at the hearings showed that the Philippine government is regularly meeting both interest and the required amortization of said bonds.

-In his annual report for 1930, the Secretary of War said:

"The total amount of outstanding indebtedness is well within the limits provided by law and sinking funds are fully maintained to cover all outstanding bonds."

FILIPINO IMMIGRATION

Filipino immigration into the United States is at present unrestricted. From several points of view it is a matter of no little concern. It involves economic and other difficulties for this country, especially in the States of the Pacific coast. According to the census of 1930 there are 45,208 Filipinos in the United States. About 35,000 of these are in the Pacific States. It is complained that these Filipinos compete with American workers and thereby contribute to the lowering of the American standard of wages and living. Spokesmen for the Filipino people in their statements to the committee contended that while the Philippine Islands reto the committee contended that while the Philippine Islands remain under the American flag their native inhabitants ought not to be excluded from this country. They, however, freely conceded the right of the United States to exclude them after independence. Nation-wide unemployment faces us with exigencies that obscure the equities of the question. Many Americans, as we learned at the hearings, regard independence, aside from the ethical considerations which warrant it, as the cure for the evils of Filipino immigrants, and urged it on those grounds.

THE SO-CALLED MORO PROBLEM

Ninety-two per cent of the approximately 13,000,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are Christians. Four per cent are pagans, and 4 per cent Mohammedans. These Mohammedans are the so-called Moros. The Mohammedan, the pagan, and the Christian Filipinos are racially identical. Their history and trachristian Filipinos are racially identical. Their history and tradition are the same. The Mohammedan and pagan Filipinos have for a long time acquiesced in the government of the islands by the Christian majority and their most important leaders have publicly given adhesion to the cause of independence. In the revolution against Spain, it was pointed out, non-Christian Filipinos united with Christian Filipinos to overthrow Spanish supporting.

authority.

There is no substantial evidence that these Moros and others have protested against Christian preponderance in the government. The contention that the United States is obligated by a treaty with the Moros to see to it that they should not be governed by Christians was negatived by the statements of W. Cameron Forbes, former Governor General and member of the Wood-Forbes comformer Governor General and member of the Wood-Forbes com-mission; Frank W. Carpenter, former governor of Mindanao and Sulu; and General Pershing, under whose supervision the Moros were disarmed. Finally, the committee were informed that one of the Moro datos, Facundo Mandi, had recently led a public mani-festation of Mohammedan Filipinos in behalf of independence, at Zamboanga. A resolution favoring complete and absolute inde-pendence, it was testified, had been drafted by the manifestants and transmitted to the President of the United States. A resolu-tion favoring independence for the Philippines, bearing the signa-tures of some 1,500 Filipinos from the Mohammedan sections of the islands, also was submitted to the committee. islands, also was submitted to the committee.

INDECISIVENESS DETRIMENTAL TO BOTH PEOPLES

To protract the present indecisive status of the Philippine Islands, your committee believe, would be to prejudice not only the welfare of the Filipinos but also American interests, especially those of agriculture and labor. The Philippines, though under the sovereignty of the United States, are for certain purposes foreign territory. Our Constitution does not apply to them. The Filipinos are not American citizens. Any sudden change in our trade relations with them would injure them, yet for reasons entirely our own we might at any time revise these relations. No large investments of outside capital are likely to be made in the Philippines while their future remains as doubtful as it now is. The insular government can provide no reasonable assurance of The insular government can provide no reasonable assurance of stability of conditions under which manufacturing, commerce, or other activities shall be undertaken there, because of the power of Congress to alter them irrespective of the wishes or the welfare of the Filipino people.

FEASIBLE PLAN FOR INDEPENDENCE

In keeping with the principles which have guided our dealings with the Filipino people these last thirty-odd years we should proceed to liberation in an orderly manner, through an institutional process which will not only provide for the erection of the new national structure but will also insure the safe and satisfactory adjustment of all present political and economic relations of the two nations.

Any plan for independence should afford a reasonable time for the readjustment of existent trade relations. The backbone of Philippine economic system is the present reciprocal free trade with the United States. Abrupt termination of that relationship would destroy many of the basic industries of the Philippines; it would seriously imperil the future of the free Philippine nation, and forfeit much of the gains the people have made under the guidance of the United States. This free-trade reciprocity was not of the Filipino people's seeking. It was enacted by the American Congress against their wishes. Once in effect, free trade stimulated the production of those commodities that are protected in the American market. It was responsible also for an extraordinary increase in the volume of Philippine-American trade and in a considerable decrease in the trade of the islands with other countries. Obviously, a sudden disruption of this relationship will injure both American and Philippine economic interests.

We can not justify the termination of this relationship without allowing the interests concerned an opportunity to prepare them-selves to meet the new conditions which will obtain after indeserves to meet the new conditions which will obtain after independence, when the Philippine Islands will have been placed outside the tariff wall of the United States. More particularly we owe a duty to Philippine industries which have been built up on the basis of free trade and to the people who depend for their livelihood on such industries. It is our duty to give them an opportunity to place themselves on a competitive basis before a radical change is forced upon them.

But while we are thus collectors for the valence of the Filippine.

But while we are thus solicitous for the welfare of the Filipino people, we can not ignore our duty to the American farmer and the American wage earner. The organizations representing American agriculture plead for protection from free Philippine imports that compete with like products of our own soil. American workers, too, call for the exclusion of Filipino immigrants.

NECESSITY FOR DEFINITE ACTION

This review of the facts and issues enfolded in the present relationship of the Philippines with the United States serves to illustrate the gravity of the problem and to underline the need for a prompt and permanent solution. There should be no further delay. Our self-interest and our self-respect coincide in demanding action.

ing action.

Our purpose in the Philippines has been accomplished. The unity of the people there is a fact. Their readiness and their eagerness for self-government have been abundantly demonstrated. Their financial capacity to support their government is beyond question. They have a balanced budget, a stable currency, a sound and efficient administration of justice, a successful system of public instruction. They have sanitation, communications, and all other services which are indispensable to progressive and orderly government. They maintain law and order through their own instrumentalities and assure protection to their own citizens and the nationals of other countries. Their educational and ecoand the nationals of other countries. Their educational and economic standards are higher than those in other countries in that nomic standards are higher than those in other countries in that part of the world. Under our inspiration and tutoring they have come to understand and prize and covet democracy. They recognize their debt of gratitude to the American people.

We have done for the Filipinos all that we have promised them except to grant them independence. We owe it not only to the Filipino people but also to our own to name the day and the way of Philippine independence.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

On the basis of these facts and considerations the duty of the United States to grant independence to the Philippine Islands is clear. The only questions to be considered are: First, "When should independence be granted?" and, second, "What should be the terms of the grant?" To solve these questions the present bill is recommended. It provides a sound, feasible, and orderly process of granting independence under conditions which shall be just and fair at once to American and Filipino interests.

The salient provisions of the bill are as follows:

1. The Filipino people are authorized to adopt a constitution and institute the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands which will exist pending complete independence. Under such government they will enjoy complete autonomy as to domestic affairs, subject only to certain reservations intended to safeguard both the sovereignty and the responsibilities of the United States.

2. Pending final relinquishment of American sovereignty, the free importation of certain Philippine products into the United States shall not exceed specified limits based upon the status quo as represented by estimated importations from existing

3. Pending independence, Philippine immigration to the United State is limited to a maximum annual quota of 50,
4. On the 4th of July immediately following the expiration of a period of eight years from the date of the inauguration of the government of the Philippine Commonwealth American sovereignty will be withdrawn and the complete independence of the Philippine Islands formally recognized. Thereupon the Philippines, to all intents and purposes, will become a country foreign to the United States. United States

5. The United States reserves the right and privilege, at its discretion, to retain and maintain military and naval bases and other reservations in the Philippine Islands.

REPORT OF THE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 132) to authorize the Secretary of War to erect one marker for the graves of 15 Confederate soldiers killed in action and buried in the La Fayette Cemetery at La Fayette, Ga., in lieu of separate markers as now authorized by law, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 436) thereon.

ALABAMA SENATORIAL CONTEST-MINORITY VIEWS

ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION-CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate proceeded to consider the following report, submitted by Mr. Norris:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5315) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That no court of the United States, as herein defined, shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, except in a strict conformity with the provisions of this act; nor shall any such restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction be issued contrary to the public policy declared in this act.

"SEC. 2. In the interpretation of this act and in determining the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States, as such jurisdiction and authority are herein defined and limited, the public policy of the United States is hereby declared as follows:

"Whereas under prevailing economic conditions, developed with the aid of governmental authority for owners of property to organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association, the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment, wherefore, though he should be free to decline to associate with his fellows, it is necessary that he have full freedom of association, selfcrganization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; therefore, the following definitions of, and limitations upon, the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States are hereby enacted.

"Sec. 3. Any undertaking or promise, such as is described in this section, or any other undertaking or promise in conflict with the public policy declared in section 2 of this act, is hereby declared to be contrary to the public policy of the United States, shall not be enforceable in any court of the United States, and shall not afford any basis for the granting of legal or equitable relief by any such court, including specifically the following:

"Every undertaking or promise hereafter made, whether written or oral, express or implied, constituting or contained in any contract or agreement of hiring or employment between any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, and any employee or prospective employee of the same, whereby

"(a) Either party to such contract or agreement undertakes or promises not to join, become, or remain a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization; or

"(b) Either party to such contract or agreement undertakes or promises that he will withdraw from an employment relation in the event that he joins, becomes, or remains a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization.

"Sec. 4. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of any labor dispute to prohibit any person or persons participating or interested in such dispute (as these terms are herein defined) from doing, whether singly or in concert, any of the following acts:

"(a) Ceasing or refusing to perform any work or to remain in any relation of employment:

"(b) Becoming or remaining a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this act:

"(c) Paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person participating or interested in such labor dispute, any strike or unemployment benefits or insurance, or other moneys or things of value;

"(d) By all lawful means aiding any person participating or interested in any labor dispute who is being proceeded against in, or is prosecuting, any action or suit in any court of the United States or of any State:

"(e) Giving publicity to the existence of, or the facts involved in, any labor dispute, whether by advertising, speaking, patrolling, or by any other method not involving fraud or violence;

"(f) Assembling peaceably to act or to organize to act in promotion of their interests in a labor dispute;

"(g) Advising or notifying any person of an intention to do any of the acts heretofore specified;

"(h) Agreeing with other persons to do or not to do any of the acts heretofore specified; and

"(i) Advising, urging, or otherwise causing or inducing without fraud or violence the acts heretofore specified, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this act.

"Sec. 5. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue a restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction upon the ground that any of the persons participating or interested in a labor dispute constitute, or are engaged in, an unlawful combination or conspiracy because of the doing in concert of the acts enumerated in section 4 of this act.

"Sec. 6. No officer or member of any association or organization, and no association or organization participating or interested in a labor dispute, shall be held responsible or liable in any court of the United States for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents, except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization of, such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof.

"Sec. 7. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue a temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, as herein defined, except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court (with opportunity for cross-examination) in support of the allegations of a complaint made under oath, and testimony in opposition thereto, if offered, and except after findings of fact, by the court, to the effect—

"(a) That unlawful acts have been threatened and will be committed unless unrestrained or have been committed and will be continued unless restrained, but no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons, association or organization making the threat or committing the unlawful act or actually authorizing or ratifying the same after actual knowledge thereof:

"(b) That substantial and irreparable injury to complainant's property will follow;

"(c) That as to each item of relief granted greater injury will be inflicted upon complainant by the denial of relief than will be inflicted upon defendants by the granting of relief;

"(d) That complainant has no adequate remedy at law; and

"(e) That the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

"Such hearing shall be held after due and personal notice thereof has been given, in such manner as the court shall direct, to all known persons against whom relief is sought, and also to the chief of those public officials of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed charged with the duty to protect complainant's property: Provided, however, That if a complainant shall also allege that, unless a temporary restraining order shall be issued without notice, a substantial and irreparable injury to complainant's property will be unavoidable, such a temporary restraining order may be issued upon testimony under oath, sufficient, if sustained, to justify the court in issuing a temporary injunction upon a hearing after notice. Such a temporary restraining order shall be effective for no longer than five days and shall become void at the expiration of said five days. No temporary restraining order or temporary injunction shall be issued except on condition that complainant shall first file an undertaking with adequate security in an amount to be fixed by the court sufficient to recompense those enjoined for any loss, expense, or damage caused by the improvident or erroneous issuance of such order or injunction, including all reasonable costs (together with a reasonable attorney's fee) and expense of defense against the order or against the granting of any injunctive relief sought in the same proceeding and subsequently denied by the court.

"The undertaking herein mentioned shall be understood to signify an agreement entered into by the complainant and the surety upon which a decree may be rendered in the same suit or proceeding against said complainant and surety, upon a hearing to assess damages of which hearing complainant and surety shall have reasonable notice, the said complainant and surety submitting themselves to the jurisdiction of the court for that purpose. But nothing herein contained shall deprive any party having a claim or cause of action under or upon such undertaking from electing to pursue his ordinary remedy by suit at law or in equity.

"Sec. 8. No restraining order or injunctive relief shall be granted to any complainant who has failed to comply with any obligation imposed by law which is involved in the labor dispute in question, or who has failed to make every reasonable effort to settle such dispute either by negotiation or with the aid of any available governmental machinery of mediation or voluntary arbitration.

"Sec. 9. No restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction shall be granted in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, except on the basis of findings of fact made and filed by the court in the record of the case prior to the issuance of such restraining order or injunction; and every restraining order or injunction granted in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute shall include only a prohibition of such specific act or acts as may be expressly complained of in the bill of complaint or petition filed in such case and as shall be expressly included in said findings of fact made and filed by the court as provided herein.

"Sec. 10. Whenever any court of the United States shall issue or deny any temporary injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, the court shall, upon the request of any party to the proceedings and on his filing the usual bond for costs, forthwith certify as in ordinary cases the record of the case to the circuit court of appeals for its review. Upon the filing of such record in the circuit court of appeals, the appeal shall be heard and the temporary injunction order affirmed, modified, or set aside with the greatest possible expedition, giving the proceedings precedence over all other matters except older matters of the same character.

"Sec. 11. In all cases arising under this act in which a person shall be charged with contempt in a court of the United States (as herein defined), the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the contempt shall have been committed: Provided, That this right shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice or to apply to the misbehavior, misconduct, or disobedience of any officer of the court in respect to the writs, orders, or process of the court.

"Sec. 12. The defendant in any proceeding for contempt of court may file with the court a demand for the retirement of the judge sitting in the proceeding, if the contempt arises from an attack upon the character or conduct of such judge, and if the attack occurred elsewhere than in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice. Upon the filing of any such demand the judge shall thereupon proceed no further, but another judge shall be designated in the same manner as is provided by law. The demand shall be filed prior to the hearing in the contempt proceeding.

"SEC. 13. When used in this act and for the purposes of this act—

"(a) A case shall be held to involve or to grow out of a labor dispute when the case involves persons who are engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation; or have direct or indirect interests therein; or who are employees of the same employer; or who are members of the same or an affiliated organization of employers or employees; whether such dispute is (1) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employees or associations of employees; (2) between one or more employers or associations of employers and one or more employers or associations of employers; or (3) between one or more employees or associations of employees and one or more employees or associations of employees; or when the case involves any conflicting or competing interests in a "labor dispute" (as hereinafter defined) of "persons participating or interested" therein (as hereinafter defined).

"(b) A person or association shall be held to be a person participating or interested in a labor dispute if relief is sought against him or it, and if he or it is engaged in the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation in which such dispute occurs, or has a direct or indirect interest therein, or is a member, officer, or agent of any association composed in whole or in part of employers or employees engaged in such industry, trade, craft, or occupation.

"(c) The term 'labor dispute' includes any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

"(d) The term "court of the United States' means any court of the United States whose jurisdiction has been or may be conferred or defined or limited by act of Congress, including the courts of the District of Columbia.

"Sec. 14. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held unconstitutional or otherwise invalid, the remaining provisions of the act and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 15. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

G. W. Norris,
T. J. Walsh,
John J. Blaine,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
Hatton W. Sumners,
A. J. Montague,

L. C. DYER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether I am correct in thinking that the Senate conferees finally gave way to the wishes of the Anti-Saloon League as expressed to them through the House conferees in regard to section 11?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as section 11 passed the Senate it provided that in all cases where a contempt charge was made against anyone in a United States court the accused should have a trial by jury. It applied to all contempt charges in United States courts. As the House passed the bill it provided that anyone charged with contempt in violation of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, or 7 should have a trial by jury, but only in criminal contempt. As we have agreed upon the section in conference, the word "criminal" has been eliminated, reference to the sections referred to in the House text has been eliminated, and section 11 now provides that anyone charged with contempt in any case arising under this act shall be entitled to a trial by jury.

As the House passed the bill it did not apply to all contempt cases under the act. As the Senate passed it, it applied to all cases, either under the act or otherwise. As the House passed it, it applied only to criminal contempt. As the Senate passed it, it applied to all contempts. The compromise was to confine it to all cases under the act and to eliminate the word "criminal," but the cases must arise under this act.

Coming to a more specific answer to the Senator's question as to what the Anti-Saloon League did, I will say that a prohibition-injunction case is not affected by the measure as it now stands. As the Senator knows, on my part at least, that is a concession, because I think it ought to apply to all cases.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator. I had gathered that something like that occurred by reading the debate in the House of Representatives which occurred yesterday when the conference report came up, because it seemed to stir up that ardent, patriotic, enthusiastic, and ever-present advocate of extreme prohibition, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton]. When it came up he wanted to make clear to the Members of the House that the new jury trials in contempt cases did not apply to prohibition. That aroused my suspicion. He said, and I quote from the Record:

The bill as it comes out of conference does not in any way interfere with the existing padlock powers that are now exercised by our courts.

The Senator will realize that is one of the matters in which the Anti-Saloon League is very greatly interested.

The Anti-Saloon League is very much afraid that a jury would not find a person guilty of contempt in a padlock case, and I think they are quite justified in that suspicion. Mr. Sumners of Texas replied:

That is understood.

To make it certain Mr. BLANTON then said:

It only has reference to labor disputes and no other question.

Mr. Sumners of Texas replied:

Well, it is a little broader than that. It affects injunctions in labor disputes and contempt proceedings growing out of what is known as an attack on the judge or the courts.

Mr. Blanton. Yes; but it does not relate to other subjects or to the prohibition question.

Mr. President, I submit that in these days, when all the evidence that we can get, disclosed by polls in dry States, of newspapers like the Wichita Beacon in Kansas, or periodicals that go all over the United States, like the Literary Digest, indicates that the great majority of the people in the United States, a 3-to-1 majority so far as we can gather from the Literary Digest poll, are in favor of repeal, it ill becomes the Congress, in endeavoring to provide that an arbitrary judge shall not be able to send some one to jail for contempt of court without his being heard by a jury of his peers, to say he shall be able to do it in a prohibition case but shall not be able to do it under the particular measure which we are about to pass.

I think the Senator from Nebraska and his committee, in putting the section in originally, were actuated by motives of justice and fairness to all persons who might be called before the courts. I think the Anti-Saloon League, through their agents in the House, in insisting that it apply not at all to prohibition matters but be confined entirely to this bill, have been guilty of the same kind of tyrannical interference with the Government of the United States that has been their practice for the past 10 or 12 years.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it will be remembered that the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BING-HAM] did about everything he could to keep the antiinjunction bill from being passed in the Senate. He was very considerate and deliberate. He sat here day after day and hour after hour and voted for every amendment that was proposed which was calculated to weaken or destroy the anti-injunction bill.

The Senator's general reactionary tendency on all legislation of that kind and his stand here are pretty well known. He lets the cat out of the bag when at this particular time he undertakes to inject the prohibition question, not so much for fear that he is concerned over the prohibition question but because of the fact that the reactionary nonpartisan interests of the country have undertaken to throw a wet blanket on everything progressive that is proposed in the country by injecting the prohibition issue into it in an effort to keep it from being

Here we have a labor bill proposed for no other purpose whatever than to prevent the Federal courts from jailing every man who is accused of having violated some labor injunction issued under the widespread jurisdiction which the courts have assumed in that character of cases. The Senator from Connecticut injects the suggestion that this was intended as a means of modifying the padlock law. No such intention was ever suggested here. Nobody had any idea that it would affect or was intended to affect the padlock law. If the Senator from Connecticut will propose an amendment or a measure providing that any man who is accused of violating a padlock injunction shall have the right of trial by jury, I for one, as a Member of the Senate, would support that kind of a proposal and would vote to give such a man the right to trial by jury in any contempt case that comes up.

But this measure was never intended to do that. I fear the motives of the Senator, which he does not himself disclose, are more in the interest of undertaking to inject the prohibition question into the matter, with which it has no concern whatever, so that economic issues will not be considered by political parties.

It is well that we might here and now stop and take stock in this matter.

In both parties in this country, in the Democratic Party and in the Republican Party, we have the reactionary element who do not want the power question to be considered, who do not want the question of the concentration of wealth to be considered, who do not want the question of an inheritance tax to be considered, who do not want the question of a gift tax to be considered, who do not want the question of higher taxes on the higher incomes of the country to be considered. Whenever a pronouncement is made by a candidate or a bill is introduced dealing with isolated cases like the one in question-and certainly there could not be any more of an isolated case than this-in order to arouse the interest of the reactionary elements in the two parties, they always bring up the prohibition question: "How do you standwet or dry?"

A short time ago the Speaker of the House of Representatives was mentioned as a candidate for President of the United States. The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Moses], observing that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had made a few remarks on certain questions, propounded the question as to how he stood-wet or

Now the labor injunction bill comes up, and the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, who stood on the floor of this House and did everything that he could to weaken the bill when it was under consideration here, wants to know how the bill stands, wet or dry? What has the Anti-Saloon League got to do with the labor injunction law?

A plan is pretty well formulated and a policy is pretty well outlined-I notice the Senator looks at the clock; it is 4.15 p. m. [laughter]-according to which the reactionary element, evidently undertaking to control the two conventions that are going to meet in Chicago, are going to try to have nothing left to the delegates there but a fight on the liquor question.

Over in the other House they have proposed a sales tax to take care of the Government deficit. Effort is being made there to increase the income-tax schedules and the inheritance-tax schedules, and other tax reforms are proposed so as to keep the corporations that scatter their seeds into about 12 different families from rendering 12 different returns so that they may avoid the surtaxes that are fixed for the higher brackets. Into that bill is now injected the question, What are you going to do about prohibition?

Senators are not going to be able to evade the economic issues, on which rest the responsibility for the welfare of this country, by rising here on the floor of the Senate and asking, "How do you stand on the prohibition question?"

The Senator from Connecticut has been a Member of the Senate for several years. I understand he comes up for election next fall, and so I assume he has had at least five years of experience here, during which time he has had abundant opportunity to offer a bill in behalf of his constituents to provide for a trial by a jury in padlock violations. Why has he hesitated for five years and allowed the poor suffering electorate of the State of Connecticut to be tried for contempt in injunction cases without the constitutional right to a trial by jury? What is the excuse for this recalcitrant action of the Senator who has waited five years, and why is he now leaving the Senate Chamber when I undertake to suggest that he might even now introduce such a bill; that he might at this time come forward and ask the Senate of the United States to go on record and provide that every man who is charged with a violation of a padlock injunction, or any other kind of injunction, shall have the right to a trial by jury?

Mr. President, we are going to have an election in this country and, if it is within the power of half a dozen or more of us to do so, we are going to have some real issues before the United States Senate and before the House of Representatives of the United States. We do not propose to have those issues cast aside and have the prohibition question injected into every question that comes up whether it be free silver, labor injunctions, or anything else.

If Senators desiring to provide for the right of trial by jury in liquor cases want to introduce that kind of bill, they will find me voting to give every accused person the right to a trial by jury on contempt charges or anything else; but are we going to try to avoid the question that is coming up here, of the concentration of wealth in the United States, by debating the prohibition question?

We sit here in the United States Senate and beg for light from Mars or from some other guiding star or from Europe, so that we may know the cause of economic distress in the United States.

We have inquired why 10,000,000 people are out of employment; why municipal bonds and the bonds of States and subdivisions of States can not be sold; here we have studied and questioned and worked and prophesied, and gone to men looking into crystal glasses, to ascertain what the trouble is to-day in the United States, to tell us why industry is paralyzed and labor is paralyzed and commerce is paralyzed and municipalities are paralyzed.

There is but one reason; it is because a handful of men in the United States own all the money in this country. That is the only reason for present deplorable conditions.

It is because 1 per cent of the people of the United States to-day are in control of 90 per cent of the wealth of the United States. All the water in which the whole human race is supposed to swim has been siphoned out, and a handful of men have been allowed to take it all and consume it, and we have left 115,000,000 people in a puddle so small that nothing but stagnation can come from it. The laboring unions of this country have been placed in a position where they can not afford any relief to the members of organized labor; the small banks have been forced into a condition where they are faltering under the concentration of wealth; but when the question arises what are we going to do about these economic questions, gentlemen who follow reactionary and recalcitrant lines want to know what we are going to do about the prohibition question in the United States. They have had time enough and years enough to act on the prohition question.

Mr. President—and this is a little bit beside the point—but a debate took place in the Senate yesterday over some remarks of Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, in which he had committed himself and probably committed the Government of the United States, which he had so successfully conducted under so many Presidents, as to the stand he would take on the matter of European debts due the United States.

It was disclosed by one of the Members of the Senate—I do not remember by whom—that in December last year Mr. Mellon had declared in favor of or had been quoted as favoring a material modification in the schedules of payments prescribed for our European debtors. Several Senators took the position that the attitude of Andrew W. Mellon was a cause for alarm.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] and I stood alone in opposing the confirmation of Mr. Mellon's nomination, I believe in the month of January, 1932, two months after he made the pronouncement as to his stand on the European debt question.

That, however, was not the main reason, nor was it my reason for opposing the confirmation of Andrew W. Mellon as ambassador to the Court of St. James. It was because the Democratic Party and the Republican Party were approving, whitewashing, sending away with a stamp of efficiency and righteousness a man who more than anyone else had been responsible for the calamities and the catastrophies that have befallen the country, for the concentration of wealth, for the greed and rapacity that have emptied the Federal Treasury, and for the condition of the municipal bond market in this country; who had directed our financial affairs to that end; and whose masterful political guidance had brought the United States of America to such a point that it is in a condition of stagnation and nothing else.

I obtained knowledge of the extent of Mellon's control over this country in a way more direct when Governor of the State of Louisiana. We undertook in that State to make a little investigation to find out what were the qualities of aluminum in public buildings, and also what were the qualities of bronze and iron and steel. We sent our architect to the United States Bureau of Standards. He came to Washington, D. C. They gave him the details as to steel and its powers of resistance to heat; they gave him the details as to bronze; they gave him the details as to brass; they gave him the details as to wood; but when we asked the United States Bureau of Standards for the facts and statistics as to aluminum we were given to understand that the United States Bureau of Standards was not allowed to investigate and report upon the possibilities and the qualities of aluminum. We could get data as to every other product, but we were told that the only source of information in detail as to aluminum would be the Aluminum Co. of America, owned and controlled by the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon.

Why was it that they investigated the bronze of Switzerland and of India and of Great Britain and the iron and steel of two continents but did not investigate and could not report upon the product of the Aluminum Co? I do not suppose that to-day that bureau could furnish such a report unless it has changed its practice, though it will report as to the products of every other company. I do not leave it to the imagination; I leave it to nothing except a rational conclusion that any man of reasonable public experience would draw that it was the influence of Andrew W. Mellon which suggested that there be no discussion and investigation of the Aluminum Trust.

So, Mr. President, in connection with the various economic measures that are going to come before us let us look behind the wool to see where the sheep is; let us see just what motives underlie the bills that are coming here. If anyone wants to introduce a prohibition repeal bill or a bill modifying the prohibition statutes or a bill for trial by jury in padlock cases, let him introduce the bill and not sit here five years and cry because he neglected it during all that time or failed to think about it.

Let him introduce that kind of a bill if the time comes, but when it comes to bills involving economic issues, as to which the people have a right to see the position of their representatives spread upon the record in terms that are certain, when it comes to questions involving the economic welfare and the life of the people of the United States who are now in distress, when it comes to the question of the concentration of wealth, or income taxes, gift taxes, and various other forms of taxation which are necessary to be passed upon in a decisive way and unattached and not mingled with prohibition or other questions that have no relation to them, let them be decided upon their merits.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to say, although the Senator from Connecticut is not now here, one thing further in explanation of the change in the particular respect about which he made inquiry.

I said when the bill was before the Senate, and I still believe, that any man charged with contempt of court, the punishment for which may be a term in jail, ought to be entitled to a jury trial; and I believe that ought to apply to prohibition cases as well as to others. That is the way the bill was drawn when it passed the Senate, but in conference a request-a reasonable one, I believe-was preferred and a reasonable statement was made to this effect: "Here is a bill which on its face has nothing whatever to do with the liquor question, which has nothing whatever to do with prohibition, and yet it does affect the prohibition law. If there is to be a change in the prohibition law it is only fair that that change should be made in the open, when the question shall be before the Congress." I think that statement has a good deal of logic in it. The conferees felt that way.

I ought to say that one of the conferees known to be opposed to prohibition, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Blaine], was one of the first to say that the conferees on the part of the Senate ought to yield on this proposition, because, he said—and I think it does him great credit—"while I am opposed to prohibition, and do not believe in it, and never have believed in it, if there is any change in the law I want to make it openly and aboveboard when the bill under consideration applies particularly to prohibition." Anyway, whatever the argument may be one way or the other, the conferees yielded on that point. In yielding, they obtained this:

Section 12 of the bill is usually referred to as the editor's section, although I think that is a misnomer, because it applies to everybody. In cases arising under section 12, where an attack is made outside of court upon the character or conduct of the judge, and the person is brought into court on a charge of contempt, under the bill as it passed the House he would not have been entitled to a jury trial. Under the Senate bill as it passed the Senate, and as we now have it in conference, he would be entitled to a jury trial

The Senate also, in that compromise, succeeded in striking the word "criminal" out of the House section. Under the House bill, before a man would be entitled to a jury trial on a charge of contempt, it would first have to appear that it was a criminal contempt. Under the Senate bill it could be either civil or criminal. Under the compromise made, the language of the Senate was agreed to, so that now anyone charged with any kind of a contempt arising under any of the provisions of this act will be entitled to a jury trial in the contempt proceedings.

It seems to me it is a very reasonable and fair compromise.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield. Mr. HEBERT. I think it is only fair to say that this provision in section 12 goes beyond cases arising under this act, because it affects contempts of every nature committed either in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere with the administration of justice, without regard to the provisions of the act itself. I think it will be conceded that section 12 was intended to take care of those charges of contempt arising in newspaper cases, and therefore those cases under section 12 would have no relation whatever to labor disputes. I think the Senator will concede

Mr. NORRIS. They might have, and they might not. They might be in a labor dispute or they might be in any

Mr. HEBERT. They might well grow out of labor disputes, but they need not grow out of labor disputes.

Mr. NORRIS. No; not necessarily.

Mr. HEBERT. Therefore, to that extent contempts under section 12 have no more relation to the subject matter of the bill under consideration than have padlock cases.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; oh, yes! Section 12 is a part of the act. We have included that in the act.

Mr. HEBERT. That is true. Mr. NORRIS. There is not anything about prohibition in the act.

Mr. HEBERT. And I might remark that there is nothing here about contempts in newspaper cases.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but section 12 applies to them. Mr. HEBERT. We want it to apply to them. It was the intention of the committee that it should apply to them.

Mr. NORRIS. It will. Mr. HEBERT. But there is no reference to them in that particular section.

Mr. NORRIS. No; and when a newspaper man, outside of court, makes an attack upon the character of the judge or the court, in my judgment it would not be proper to say that because he is a newspaper man he should have any more privilege than though he is a common laborer in the street who makes that kind of attack, and section 12 will apply to both of them. Whenever an attack is made upon the character of the judge, whether it be by a newspaperman or a banker or a laborer or a lawyer or a minister, and the man is brought in for contempt of court because of the charge, he will be entitled to a jury trial, and he will likewise be entitled to a change of judges.

Mr. HEBERT. But, as I understand, if the Senator will permit me, any other case would not come within the purview of that section. For instance, the cases to which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] referred-padlock-injunction cases—would not come within the purview of section 12.

Mr. NORRIS. No; they would not, unless the charge was made in that kind of a case.

Suppose we were in court here now, and we had a prohibition case before us, trying it, and some editor or some other man out on the street made a charge against the character of the judge and the way he was conducting the prohibition case. He could be arrested for contempt and brought in before the judge, and he would be entitled to a jury trial under this act.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator point out just where, under the act, he would be entitled to a jury trial?

Mr. NORRIS. Under section 11.

Mr. BINGHAM. Section 11 applies only to cases arising under this act.

Mr. NORRIS. And the case I cited would arise under this act. That was where the House bill fell down. It did not apply to section 12, which is a part of this act just as much as the other sections to which it did apply. Let me read it. I do not think there is any doubt about that proposition.

Mr. BINGHAM. But, speaking as a layman and not as a lawyer, it does not seem to me that section 12 provides any new means of incurring contempt. Section 12 says that-

The defendant in any proceeding for contempt of court may file with the court a demand for the retirement of the judge-

But section 11 provides-

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not read far enough. Let me read a little further, and he will see the point.

Section 12 reads as follows:

The defendant in any proceeding for contempt of court may file with the court a demand for the retirement of the judge sitting in the proceeding, if the contempt arises from an attack upon the character or conduct of such judge, and if the attack occurred elsewhere than in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; but— Mr. NORRIS. That is the section usually referred to as the newspaper section. He gets the jury trial under Section 11, and that applies to any case arising under this act. It reads:

In all cases arising under this act in which a person shall be In all cases arising under this act in which a person shall be charged with contempt in a court of the United States (as herein defined), the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the contempt shall have been committed: Provided, That this right shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice or to apply to the misbehavior, misconduct, or disobedience of any officer of the court in respect to the writs, orders or process of the court. orders, or process of the court.

Does not that make it plain?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am at a disadvantage with the Senator, because he knows so much more about the law than I do; but it occurs to me that a contempt arising from an attack upon the character or conduct of the judge is something which is far older than this act.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. All contempts are.

Mr. BINGHAM. That has nothing to do with this act. Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. The Senator must not forget that it is just as much a part of this act as any other section in the bill. It is a part of this act; and if any contempt arising under this act-

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator be patient with me? Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I hope I shall be able to make it

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. If I am right about it, and I think I am. Mr. BINGHAM. May I say that this is the way it seems to me, and then the Senator can tell me where I am wrong:

This bill sets up, under sections 4, 5, 6, 7, and so forth, a number of things which the court may not do and may do, and which, if a person does, may result in holding him in contempt. If the person is held in contempt, then under Section 11 he may ask for a jury trial.

Section 12 refers to an attack upon the character or conduct of a judge. It refers inferentially to another statute, not to anything in this act.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; not to another statute; no.

Mr. BINGHAM. Where in this act is there anything which refers to a contempt arising from an attack upon the character or conduct of the judge?

Mr. NORRIS. In section 12. That is the only place.

Mr. BINGHAM. We seem to be going around in a circle. If the Senator will be patient with me one moment more—

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is the way it appears to a layman reading the bill who has not the profound legal knowledge which I freely grant to the Senator from Nebraska:

That the act provides that in cases arising under it in which a person shall be charged with contempt of court, he shall have a jury trial; and it would seem to me that that applied to all the cases referred to which are not exempted by the provisions of this act. Then, in questions which arise from an attack upon the character of the judge, the act says that the defendant may have a new judge.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. But it does not in that section say that he may have a jury.

Mr. NORRIS. No, that is true; but it does not in sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 say that he may have a trial by jury. The trial by jury is all provided in one section, and by its own terms it refers to the entire act.

Let me say to the Senator—and this may make it plain to him—that sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 are specific statements prohibiting the issuing of injunctions. If a man is charged with contempt because he has violated an injunction issued under sections 3, 4, 5, 6, or 7, it is because there has been an order made by the court. For instance, the court says, "You shall not do so and so" under one of those sections, and it is charged that the man against whom the injunction is issued has violated that order. Then, and only then, can he be arrested and tried for contempt. He will have a jury trial.

Section 12 applies to an entirely different class of contempts. No order of the court has been issued there. Before a man can be tried on a charge of contempt under any of the sections I have mentioned, there is first an order of the court. It is that order which he violates, so that that must precede every possibility of a trial for a violation of the order.

In the case of a contempt arising under section 12—and it is just as clearly a contempt as though the man had violated an order of the court—no order has been issued. The man charged with contempt has not violated any order of court. He has simply said that this judge, we will say, is corrupt. He is brought in for contempt of court for saying that, not because he has violated an order of court, as he would be in the other cases, but it is contempt just the same, and the judge has the same authority over him that he has over some one violating an order that the judge issued under one of the other sections.

issued under one of the other sections.

We could have put in "section 12" in words. We could have added "12" to the other section, and put it in by specific language, and said that anyone charged with contempt under sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 12 shall be entitled to a trial by jury; but, instead of saying it in that way, we put it all in one sentence and said, "Anyone charged with contempt arising under this act"; and there can not be a contempt arising under this act unless it arises under sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 12 tions 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 12.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Does that make it any plainer to the Senator?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes. May I ask one more question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is clear, then, that if a judge issues an injunction in a prohibition matter, such as a padlock case, and some one makes fun of him or attacks him, or does something which would bring him into contempt, that person may demand that he be tried for the contempt by some other judge, and by a jury? That is correct, is it?

Mr. NORRIS. The one who makes the charge; yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. But if a tyrannical or extra dry judge, if I may use the term "extra dry" as applying to something which is not good to drink—

Mr. NORRIS. To my mind, that does not mean anything; but I suppose the Senator knows something to which it does refer?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am sorry the Senator does not know what it refers to [laughter]; but never mind. If an extra dry judge issues a tyrannical injunction regarding a hotel and puts a padlock on it, and there is a breach of that injunction, then the contempt case may not be tried by a jury?

Mr. NORRIS. It depends. If the judge in the case the Senator puts has issued an order—say I am the defendant, and I am charged with violating the order, I do not come under this measure at all.

Mr. BINGHAM. And therefore you are not entitled to a jury trial?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not entitled to a jury trial. Mr. BINGHAM. That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. On the other hand, suppose in the same case I go out and say, "The judge who issued this padlock injunction is a corrupt man," and I am tried for saying that about the judge. That is a trial for contempt arising under this measure, and I am entitled to two things: I can make that judge step aside, and get another judge, and I am entitled to a jury trial when the other judge comes on the bench. This bill places upon that kind of contempt a thing which it does not place upon the other kind of contempt. It gives a man who has made a charge against a judge the right to demand another judge, in addition to having a jury trial, and the reason for that is perfectly plain. When an attack is made upon a judge himself, it is patently unfair that that judge, who has a direct interest in the suit and who is really a party to it, should not preside and say what evidence should be admitted and what should be excluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. I agree with the Senator, but I do hope that the Senator does not think that the term "extra dry" is equivalent to "corrupt." Some people think so, but that was not my intention.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know. I thought from what the Senator said that "extra dry" was something to drink. I do not know.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator seemed to interpret it as meaning something corrupt.

Mr. NORRIS. I judged that, coming from the Senator from Connecticut, knowing his well-known attitude on prohibition, that if it has a covert meaning it has something to do with prohibition, without doubt.

Mr. BINGHAM. And therefore with corruption?

Mr. NORRIS. No, indeed. I agree with the Senator, as I have said so often, and I have suffered some abuse on account of it, even since this bill has been pending, that any man charged with contempt in any court in the United States, or, for that matter, a State court, if we had jurisdiction, in any case, no matter what it is, ought to have a jury trial.

I have said so to the representatives of the Anti-Saloon League who have come to me about this bill. I have said to them, moreover, that in my judgment, prohibitionist that I am—and I think my record will sustain my statement that during all my public life I have tried to be consistent—as I recall I said to the men who called upon me about this bill, "You are not as good prohibitionists as I am. Prohibition is on trial. It has lost many of its best friends. We all have to concede that. In my judgment, it has not been honestly and fairly enforced at any time since the law was enacted, and if we follow you and say we want a different law, a different rule, applied to prohibition cases from what is applied to any other case we are going to lose the support of more good people in this country, who will take the other side of the question and demand the repeal of prohibition."

I am not finding fault with those who wanted to change this bill because they had reason for it; there was some reason for it based on logic; but in my judgment the two classes of people who have done more harm to their respective causes-one wet and the other dry-are the wet cranks and the prohibition cranks. If we want to have the people respect the prohibition law, we ought to ask for nothing under that law which we are not willing to ask for under any other law.

It is no answer to say that there will sometimes be juries which will not convict. That is a charge which can be made against our jury system. Every man who has tried lawsuits before juries, every man who has ever presided in court and heard jury trials, knows that juries make mistakes, as all other human beings do, and they sometimes render verdicts which seem almost obnoxious. But it is the best system I know of. I would not have it abolished; and when I see how juries will really do justice when a biased and prejudiced judge is trying to lead them astray I am confirmed in my opinion that, after all, our jury system is one which the American people, who believe in liberty and justice, will not dare to surrender. I like to have trial by jury preserved in all kinds of cases where there is a dispute of facts.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, if the friends of the Senator in the prohibition cause had taken the same fair-minded attitude he has taken and is taking on this question, if they had followed his advice in adopting the section as to jury trials referred to as it came from his hands and from his committee, they would be in a less sorry plight to-day than that in which they find themselves. I congratulate the Senator, if he will permit me to do so, on the position which he has taken, which is eminently fair and just.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, when the anti-injunction bill came up in the Senate originally I was absent, not only from the Senate, but from Washington, on account of a death in my family and, therefore, could not vote. I was paired in favor of the bill.

I want to say that I was not only in favor of the bill, but I am in favor of the conference report and hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me say, in conclusion, that several Senators requested me not to ask for a roll call. One of the reasons why I was about to ask for one was because of a request made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar]. Since he has made his statement, I am ready for a vote, and I shall not ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

DEBT CANCELLATION-STATEMENT OF MR. MELLON

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, on yesterday there was some discussion in the Senate about a statement made by Mr. Mellon in December of last year with reference to the World War debt. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed] cast some suspicion on the correctness of the quotation of Mr. Mellon's statement read by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson]. I hold in my hand a copy of that statement as published in the United States Daily quoting verbatim the language of Mr. Mellon. It is true that there is no notarial seal on it, it is not acknowledged before a notary public, nor does it bear any affidavit as to the authenticity of Mr. Mellon's signature, but it does purport to be a formal statement on the authority of the United States Daily. I ask unanimous consent that it be published in the RECORD for the information of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and any other doubters who may have any suspicion as to the correctness of the statement quoted here yesterday.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the United States Daily, December 12, 1931]

Mr. Mellon Defines Nation's Position on Debt Cancellation-AMERICA OPPOSES STRIKING OFF OBLIGATIONS BUT MUST RECOGNIZE THE ABILITY TO PAY, HE DECLARES

The United States Government does not favor cancellation of the United States Government does not lavor cancentation of the war debts, but changed economic conditions make it the duty of "the executive as well as the legislative branches of the Government" to reexamine the ability of debtor nations to pay, the Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, declared in a statement issued December 11 clarifying President Hoover's recommendations to Congress. dations to Congres

The statement follows in full text:
"There should be no misinterpretation as to the administration's recommendations to Congress relating to the debts due us from foreign governments and the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. The administration is opposed to cancellation. No recommendation made carries any such impli-

" MUST FACE REALITIES

"It is, however the duty of those in authority to deal with realities, and there is no escaping the fact that some of our debtors can not meet in full the payments due us until there has been a substantial measure of economic recovery and that the position of others is so changed as to call for consideration of their present situation in the light of existing circumstances.

"Our debt settlements were effected on the basis of the capacity of the debtors to pay. As the President said in his statement of June 20, 'As the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world.'

"BRITISH POSITION

"Take the case of Great Britain, our best customer, which even in the depression year 1930 took $678,000,000 worth of American agricultural and industrial products. The economic and financial changes of the past year have immensely increased the burden of her payments to us. The series of events through which Great Britain was forced off the gold standard are too recent to require enumeration.

"To-day the pound sterling is selling at $3.315 to the pound, which is a 32 per cent discount, as compared with last year, when it stood at tariff parity of $4.866. All debts to Great Britain from foreign governments, except reparation payments, which are not being collected at all this year and are not likely to be collected in full next year, are payable in sterling. Her debt to us is payable in gold dollars. The combined effect of these unfavorable factors results in an enormously increased burden for the people of Great Britain.

"Payments during the present fiscal year will serve to exemplify the magnitude of the additional burden.

"With the pound sterling at par, the British Treasury needs 32,800,000 pounds in order to pay us $159,500,000. With the pound sterling at the rate at which it sold on December 10, pound sterling at the rate at which it sold on December 10, 1931, it would take 48,100,000 pounds, or an increase of 15,300,000 pounds, or 47 per cent. Or in other words, the burden on the British taxpayer is increased by almost one-half.

"When the British debt settlement was made it was estimated that its present value at 4½ per cent was 30 per cent of the total amount due prior to funding. If the amount to be raised in pound sterling to meet the obligation to us in dollars is increased by 47 per cent, it becomes apparent that from the standpoint of the British taxpayer he is asked to meet not the obligation as established by our debt commission but an amount considerably in excess of such obligation.

excess of such obligation.
"Nothing could more forcibly illustrate the changed situation which places, on the executive as well as the legislative branches of Government, the duty of reexamining the obligations of our debtors and their ability to meet them during a period of worldwide economic depression.

"Does anyone believe that Austria or Hungary should be asked to pay the installments due from them in view of the extraordinarily straightened circumstances in which the people of those two countries find themselves and great difficulty which they experience in obtaining foreign exchange for the purpose of carrying on even the minimum of effectual commerce with the rest of the world?

"Does anyone believe that Germany should be asked by the United States Government to meet her payments on the costs of the army of occupation when such a demand by us must be inevitably followed by demands of other creditors to pay her reparations in full?

"These instances should suffice to demonstrate that to stand on the letter of our bond and to refuse to investigate or to consider the facts is to fail in our responsibility to the American people whom we represent and to the debtors whose capacity to pay we ourselves undertook to determine.

"What intelligent business man or banker would blindly refuse to investigate or to consider the altered circumstances of a debtor whose unsecured obligation he held? The situation of our debtors whose unsecured obligation he held? The situation of our debtors has been immensely altered during the course of the last two years. New questions in relation to these debts are bound to arise in the course of the next few months. The Congress should be in a position through a commission created by it and composed in part of its own Members to ascertain what the facts actually are and to deal with these new problems as they arise.

"It is with such thoughts as these in mind that the President recommended the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. I am confident that upon mature consideration this recommendation will commend itself to the Congress."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the New York Times this morning dealing in a very illuminating way with the tariff question.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, March 18, 1932] BLAMING OUR COPYISTS

Who could have imagined that a Republican administration would set up a loud wail about the bad effects of high tariffs?
Of course, it is the tariffs which perfidious foreigners are erecting against our exports. Our own beloved and truly American tariffs are perfect. Yet a survey of the outlook for international trade, just published by the Department of Commerce at Washington, sees only a dark outlook and predicts a further "contraction" in our sales of merchandise abroad. The chief cause assigned is the new policy of protection in England; along with the adoption of higher rates and "quotas" by the principal nations on the Continent. The result is such an outburst of selfish nationalism, such a stupid return to the discarded principles of the old mercantile system, such a restriction and even strangulation of foreign commerce profitable to the countries which foster it, that a period of declining exports and imports is clearly indicated.

In all this there is not a word about American responsibility for rousing this spirit of discrimination and retaliation in trade across national boundaries. We had full warning of the danger before the Hawley-Smoot tariff was enacted in 1930. Congress was ap-pealed to by economists and industrialists not to rush again into that tariff blind alley. President Hoover was solemnly besought by more than 1,000 political economists and financiers not to sign the tariff bill. He naturally has great respect for such experts, but felt obliged to listen to the expert politicians, who assured him that if he vetoed the tariff bill his party would be ruined. As it is, the party has been drawn pretty near the edge of ruin, and its protective policy did not in the least hinder its being swept toward the abyss. But our own excesses and follies in the way of protection have not prevented us from gravely pointing out to European countries the grave error which they are making in imitating us. Since the classic example of the Gracchi complaining of sedition there has been nothing so inconsistent or impudent as the United States tearfully reproaching Europe for going tariff

PROHIBITION-" WHAT DIXIE WILL DO IN 1932"

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask to have published in the RECORD an address by Dr. A. J. Barton, chairman of the executive committee of the Anti-Saloon League, before the biennial convention of the Anti-Saloon League of America, at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., January 19, 1932, entitled "What Dixie Will Do in 1932."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If there seems to be a rhyme in the statement of the subject, let If there seems to be a rhyme in the statement of the subject, let all effort at rhyming be immediately disclaimed. If rhyme occurs, it is by accident and not by design. Dixie refers to that section of the United States commonly known as the South and frequently referred to as Dixie. Nineteen thirty-two is the good year of grace upon which we have just entered and during which the citizens of these United States will elect a President to serve them for the four years beginning March 4, 1933. The question then is, "What will the Southern States do in the presidential election next November?" This question is based on prohibition for prohibition vember?" This question is based on prohibition for prohibition and the attitude of candidates and political parties on prohibition will be the chief determining factor in what the Southern States

To essay the rôle of the political prophet in these days might seem adventurous even if one were a political expert. I am not a political prophet nor the son of a political prophet, though I may with proper modesty claim to know as much about the South as the three defeated candidates for the Presidency, who spoke recently in this room at the Jackson Day dinner, including the one from Ohio, who informed the Southern people that they should drive the preachers back to their pulpits so that the people can get the truth about prohibition.

To be able to forecast or to judge what anybody, any group of persons, or any group of States will do one must first form some judgment as to their character. Broadly, the Southern people are just plain, honest Americans, not different from other Americans wherever found. The South is not particularly peculiar and does not wish to be considered peculiar, much less sectional in feeling.

motive, and attitude.

But there are features of the South worth considering, things that have affected the course of the South in the past and that will undoubtedly affect that course in the future.

1. The southern people for the most part are a homogeneous people. There are Mexicans on the southwestern border; there are French-speaking Americans in Louisiana; there are Italians along the Gulf Coast; there are other foreigners in comparatively small numbers scattered here and there. But for the most part the southern people are a homogeneous people descended from early American settlers, preserving in large measure the ideals, early American settlers, preserving in large measure the ideals, the traditions of their fathers.

2. The southern people are loyal to the United States Government; they believe in the Constitution and the laws of this Government. If this statement seems to any to be contradicted by the War between the States in 1861–1865, the contradiction is only apparent. In that unfortunate struggle the Southern States contended for what they believed to be their clear rights under the Constitution as it was framed by the fathers of the Republic and as it existed at that time. The South not only accepted the Constitution as it was framed by the fathers of the Republic and as it existed at that time. The South not only accepted defeat at arms but accepted and has observed amendments to the Constitution added in the convulsions of war when the South was prostrate in defeat and poverty and the Southern States could not exercise their right and sovereignty in amending the Constitution. The Southern States have never rebelled against the Constitution of the United States. The southern people do not believe that the Constitution of the United States is "the supreme law of the land" only in spots, or subject to the will of a single State, or Tammany Hall, or Chicago racketeers, or the beer barons. The people of the South, let it be said again for emphasis, are loyal Americans believing in the National Government and standing for law and order.

3. The people of the South are a religious people. They are not nearly as pious and upright as they ought to be. They do not plead any superiority. They fall far below their own ideals in many things. They have among them a large element of citizens without church affiliations or distinct religious profession. But there out church affiliations or distinct religious profession. But there are in the South vast religious constituencies with their church organizations, their ministers, their schools and colleges, their religious papers, and their benevolent institutions. Whatever may be thought or said about the South concerning the attitude of its people on any question—social, economic or political—one would go far afield if one failed to take into account the religious constituencies of the Southern States. In 1926 the Southern States had a population of 46,000,000 in round numbers. Of this number something over 20,000,000 professed definite religious beliefs and had church affiliation. Moreover, it is perfectly safe to say that, in spite of all shortcomings, these people, aside from rare possible exceptions, believe that a state or nation can do right or do wrong the same as an individual and that a citizen can well carry his sense of right to the ballot box.

WHAT THE SOUTH HAS DONE

In any effort to forecast what any people or group of people will do in the future, one of the best helps is to review what they have do in the future, one of the best helps is to review what they have done in the past. This is particularly true in the present case. What the Southern States will do in regard to prohibition is largely indicated by what they have done in the past. It is worthy of note that practically all of the Southern States about whose course we are thinking adopted prohibition in their own right and by the exercise of their own sovereign will. The list stands as follows: Oklahoma, in 1907, born dry; Georgia, 1908; Tennessee, North Carolina and Mississippi, 1909; Alabama, 1915; Arkansas and South Carolina, 1916; Texas by statute in 1918; constitutional amendment, 1919; Florida, 1919; Kentucky, 1920.

constitutional amendment, 1919; Florida, 1919; Kentucky, 1920. It is worthy of note also that most of these States, as the dates indicate, adopted prohibition long before national prohibition was enacted and even before it was thought of as a possi-bility in the near future.

What these States will do to protect and promote prohibition. not only State prohibition enacted by them but national prohibi-tion which they joined the other States of the Union to enact, is best indicated by the election returns in the presidential campaign in 1928.

It is well known and well understood by all thoughtful and observant people that prohibition was the chief issue in that campaign. The South has been and is a section of great political solidarity. The political views and affiliations of southern people have been deep and profound. The allegiance and loyalty of the southern people to the political party with which they have been affiliated was almost tantamount to a religious con-

In 1928 the nominee of that party assumed to himself the right In 1928 the nominee of that party assumed to himself the right to cast overboard the platform adopted by the party convention and to announce a platform of his own, which declared in substance for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Thus for the first time prohibition became a party issue. This brought a crisis. This brought the southern people face to face with a real test. On the one hand were the political affiliations and traditions of the southern people, and on the other was the question of national prohibition and its preservation and promotion. It is perfectly fair and safe to say that no people has ever been confirmted by a political issue which stirred them more dearly. confronted by a political issue which stirred them more deeply or tested their metal and purpose more thoroughly. The question was, What shall we do now? Shall we accept the candidacy of a man who has repudiated the party and made his own platform and personality the supreme issue of the campaign, or shall we stand for the preservation and promotion of a great shall we stand for the preservation and promotion of a great civic, social, economic, and moral reform?

Confronted by such an alternative the people of the South were not slow to decide. The election returns showed that the States commonly known as border States, namely, Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Oklahoma, had all repudiated the candidate who chose to desert the party and to make himself and his wet program the chief issue of the campaign. Not only so, but

4 of the 10 Southern States which had formed the solid and unbroken South had likewise repudiated the wet program and had given their electoral votes to the candidate who was pledged to the support and maintenance of the eighteenth amendment and its supporting legislation. For the first time in their political history, Virginia, North Carolina, Florida, and Texas gave their electoral votes to the Republican nominee. This they did not because they are fundamentally Republican but because the eighteenth amendment, to which the people of the South are not only committed but are deeply devoted, had been challenged and would have been endangered by the election of a man committed to its destruction. Probably no greater political upheaval ever took place in any section of the country or group of States than is expressed in these remarkable and significant facts.

Let it be said here that in the mind of your speaker the chief determining factor in this whole matter was the devotion and loyalty of the South to the prohibition cause. The religious issue was not the major factor, if indeed a factor at all, in producing these results. The much-discussed religious issue, in so far as it was a factor, operated in two directions. The defeated candidate of that campaign gained more votes than he lost because of his religious affiliations. Undoubtedly the most of his correligionists gave him their support while at the same time multitudes of citi-zens of other religious faiths and affiliations gave him their sup-port as an answer to the possible charge of religious narrowness and intolerance; in a word, to show that whatever their religious views, they were broad and nonsectarian in their interpretation of civic matters and citizenship rights.

We now have before us, briefly sketched, who the people of the South are and what they have done.

WHAT THE SOUTH WILL NOT DO

It may be helpful in undertaking to indicate what the South will do to note some things that the South will not do. For one thing, the South will not repudiate the moral and religious leadership of the pastors and ministers of the churches and of the people as represented by the churches.

During the last campaign the chairman of one of the political During the last campaign the chairman of one of the political parties, who had accepted the chairmanship, as he himself announced, because he saw in it an opportunity to aid in ridding the country of the "damnable affliction of prohibition," announced as one of his policies to have the people cut off the salaries of pastors who stood for what they conceived to be right in civic and moral matters. It is probable that no other one thing had quite so much to do as did this outburst against the pastors in determining the attitude of the South. In the recent Jackson Day dinner held in this city, a defeated candidate for the Presidency advised held in this city, a defeated candidate for the Presidency advised that the people should call the preachers back to their pulpits so that the people may get the truth about prohibition.

For the information of that gentleman and all others concerned, two things may be said: First, the preachers of the South are in their pulpits and they have been in their pulpits through all the years. They have been preaching and will continue to preach the gospel of the kingdom of God. They will undertake to show and lead the people in the doctrine that evil and immorality do not cease to be evil and immoral when adopted as a policy of government. They have preached and will continue to preach applied Christianity; a Christianity which will pervade every phase and sphere of life, both private and public. Indeed, the preachers of the South are in their pulpits and that is one of the chief explanations of the position of the southern people on the great social, economic, and moral reform about which we are thinking.

Second, if the gentleman from Ohio means that the people of the South should attempt to close the mouths or change the messages of southern preachers so that they can not preach public morality, then that gentleman does not know either the preachers or the people of the South.

The preachers of the South are not a set of hirelings to cower under the lash of the political whip. They are prophets of God and will continue to prophesy and cry aloud in God's name for the destruction of evil and for the establishment of good and the enthropment of vightequeness.

enthronement of righteousness

Another thing the people of the South will not do is to submit to the political domination and leadership of corrupt and inpolitical organizations and machines such as Tammany Hall, under the influence of which judgeships have been bartered and sold like sheep in the shambles. No candidate for the Presidency can or will receive the support of the southern people who comes forth in the campaign with the badge and smell of Tammany Hall upon him. In a word, the South will not lend its aid in putting the Tammany tiger in control of the White House and the affairs of this Government.

Another thing the South will not do: It will not throw overboard in its local and State affairs the party with which it has long been affiliated, because, forsooth, it may have to give its support to a presidential candidate of a different party in order to express its devoted conviction as to the cause of prohibition. In a word, the Southern States will remain true and loyal in their

In a word, the Southern States will remain true and loyal in their local and State affairs to the party to which they have long been devoted, even though they find it necessary again to break with that party in the broader field of national candidates.

One of the things the South will not do is this: The South will not give its support to any candidate for the Presidency who is nominated on a wet platform or who himself is wet. The South believes in prohibition. The South stands for prohibition. The South will fight for prohibition. The South knows that prohibition, both National and State, would be seriously menaced if any man were elected to the Presidency who is committed to its repeal or modification.

In the midst of all the fuss and smoke the South knows that resubmission would be a step toward repeal, with repeal as its purpose and objective. The South knows that increase in the alcoholic content of permitted beverages would be in violation of the eighteenth amendment and would work its destruction. The South will take its stand and fight to the bitter end every man and every movement seeking the repeal or modification of pro-hibition as now embedded in the Constitution and laws of our

The South will not be misled by the hue and cry about State rights. The South knows that the wets who are now paying lip service to State rights either do not understand what State rights means or else, knowing what it means, are deliberately or maliciously misinterpreting and perverting this thing which is sacred and foundmental in our Covernment. and fundamental in our Government.

The South knows and believes in a doctrine of State rights. They know that the Federal Government is a government not of direct powers but of ceded or conferred powers. The South knows that the Federal Government is the creature of the States; that when the States formed the Federal Government they reserved to themselves forever the right to amend the Federal Constitution.

The South knows that when the States, acting in the manner prescribed by themselves, amend the Federal Constitution, this procedure is not in violation of or repudiation of State rights, but is the highest expression of State rights. The South knows that the eighteenth amendment is the highest, fullest, and freest exercise of State rights that we have ever had since the Republic was founded. The South will not now be influenced in the slightest degree by the hue and cry raised concerning State rights by sinister and destructive influences, and the men who raise that by sinister and destructive influences, and the men who raise that cry, not because they believe in State rights, but because they believe in the rights of liquor to control not only their own stomachs and pocketbooks but to control all government for its own nefarious ends.

The people of the South will not be deceived or misled by talk of a referendum on prohibition as we now have it, whether such talk proposes a national referendum or State referenda, no matter from what source such proposals may come. The people of the South believe in a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." They know that such Government we now have. The people of the South know that we have no provision in our The people of the South know that we have no provision in our present form of government for a referendum, whether National or State, on any part of the Constitution of the United States or on any law enacted by Congress in pursuance thereof. Our opposition to all suggestions about a referendum is not based on any lack of confidence in the people nor any doubt that the great majority of the American people are in favor of prohibition. We have all confidence in the people and we know, or think we know, that a great majority of the people believe in prohibition and stand unfalteringly for its support and perpetuation.

unfalteringly for its support and perpetuation.

Their will has been expressed in the regular and constitutional way, over and over, again and again, and will continue to be so expressed. To propose a referendum on this question is to propose a revolution in our form of government. If you could have a referendum on prohibition, you could have a referendum on slavery, or any other provision of the Constitution. The only "referendum" that can be had on prohibition is the one had every two years in the election of all Members of the House of Representatives and of one-third of the Senators and the one had every four years in the election of a President. Whenever the majority of the people in two-thirds of the congressional districts and a mayears in the election of a President. Whenever the majority of the people in two-thirds of the congressional districts and a majority of the people in two-thirds of the States tire of prohibition they can easily elect enough wet Senators and Representatives to propose to the States an amendment for repeal; and whenever the people of the States instruct a majority of their presidential electors to cast their ballots for a wet candidate for President we will have a President out of sympathy with the present order.

We believe in the people; we know that the people believe in prohibition. The people also believe in the orderly and constitutional process of government. Even if the people desired to overturn prohibition they would not be willing to overthrow their form of government as a means to that end. Our task now is not simply to protect and promote prohibition but also to protect and promote our form of government and its constitutional and orderly processes.

Some wets more devoted to liquor than to law may advocate a procedure that would destroy our form of government; even misinformed drys here and there may be misled by such proposals, but the people of the South know better and will not be misled. The people of the South will never consent that the drys shall assist the wets in undoing and destroying the results of the prayers, labors, and sacrifices of more than 100 years which brought the greatest reform in the greatest Government in the history of the organized governments of the world.

WHAT THE SOUTH WILL DO

This final question has been answered already in the fore-This mail question has been answered arready in the fore-going declaration of what the South will not do, except this final and closing word: If the South is forced to a choice it will stand in the future as it has stood in the past, firm and true to its highest and best convictions on a great social, economic, and moral issue and will cast its vote for a presidential candidate committed to the maintenance, protection and promotion of prohibition, regardless of party label.

The South hopes that the political party with which it is always affiliated and to the interests of which it is deeply devoted, will not, under the influence of an evil and alien leadership, betray the moral convictions of the South and force upon it any such choice or alternative. But, having lived in every part of the South and having worked intimately with the people of the South for many years, knowing the South as he believes he does, this speaker would warn all political party leaders that if they desire or expect the support of the South they must stand before the South with clean hands and pure hearts on the subject of prohibition and must not attempt to betray the convictions of the South or destroy the highest interests of the South and the highest interests of the American people. American people.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter from the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, Department of Washington, with reference to their attitude regarding legislation pertaining to the national defense. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WASHINGTON, SPOKANE CHAPTER, RESERVE OFFICERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Spokane, Wash., March 12, 1932.

Spokane, Wash., March 12, 1932.

Hon. Wesley L. Jones,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Jones: The Spokane chapter, Reserve Officers' Association, has authorized me, by unanimous vote, to present its views respecting legislation pertaining to our national defense.

It is of vital importance at this time that the provisions of the national defense act, as amended by the act of Congress, approved June 4, 1920, be carried out to the fullest extent, taking into consideration not only the maintenance equipment and training of sideration not only the maintenance, equipment, and training of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves, but also the precarious condition of world peace, which has be-come seriously imperiled because of recent territorial acquisitions by the Japanese Empire in Manchuria and China.

Our organization is not advocating a large army, nor any change in the post-war policy of the United States as arrived at by the Congress, and as enacted in the national defense act, as amended

June 4, 1920.

Our interests, and I speak for 200 reserve officers in Spokane County, primarily are those of taxpayers and citizens, not of professional soldiers. We believe it would be very unwise to reduce the already slender Military Establishment of this country. Many of our members have seen for themselves the unnecessary cost in human lives that is paid when a nation, almost totally uninstructed in military defense, is suddenly hurled into war against a nation well equipped and with large trained reserves. It is our belief that properly instructed leadership and adequate equipment acquired in times of peace will save many thousands of lives in time of war, to say nothing of many millions of dollars. Our Regular Army is not large enough to supply all of the required leadership and personnel necessary for any major mobilization; most of it will of necessity be derived from civilian sources, such as the Organized Reserves. Our interests, and I speak for 200 reserve officers in Spokane as the Organized Reserves.

The groups advocating disarmament frequently cite figures and statistics which are distorted. Post-war bonuses and compensation to able-bodied veterans who received no physical or mental injuries should not be classified as expenditures for national defense, nor post-war loans at high rates of interest to foreign countries, which are secured but unpaid. Neither do they allow for the vast difference in money expenditures between an orderly and adequate preparation for national defense as compared to the tremendous sums spent in a great hurry to make up for lost time and opportunity. When our Nation has heretofore been confronted with a war, and with insufficient equipment and personnel, it has of necessity had to waste in order to make haste; viz, the $700,-000,000 appropriation for the airplane program in 1917, after the declaration of war against Germany, only resulted in a comparatively few combat airplanes being delivered to the theater of war in France.

In the Battles of Cantigny, St. Mihiel, and Meuse-Argonne, in France, our attacking Infantry did not have sufficient artillery support with high-explosive shell, as compared to German troops, and as a result our Infantry losses were out of proportion to the ground gained by the attacks.

War per se can not be averted by disarmament, prayers, or curses. The present situation in China is ominous, and can not be ignored. According to the news, Japan has violated the provisions of the 9-power treaty, the Kellogg-Briand peace pact, the open-door policy, and the league covenant of the treaty of Versailles. Japan has acquired, by force of arms, all of southern Manchuria, and is the dominant military power in the free port of Shanghai; and with its army and navy has overturned the balanced equilibrium of power amongst the nations of the north Pacific Ocean. Historical precedent teaches us that this is one of the primary causes of war; and usually, coming events cast their shadows before! their shadows before!

We, therefore, recommend the following:

1. That the Regular Army should be kept in its present commissioned and enlisted strength, and that it be adequately equipped with modern ordnance and aircraft of advanced design. In its relations with the civilian components, the Regular Army does more than provide merely military training for interested citizens; it brings into closer contact the Regular Army, National Guard, and Organized Reserves, and develops an effective spirit of cooperation and wholeheartedness.

Reserve officers should receive active-duty training for short 2. Reserve officers should receive active-duty training for short periods. Extension courses and inactive-duty training in military studies are very valuable, but should be applied by occasional active duty to aid in its effectiveness. The older reserve officers with war-time experience are being gradually supplanted by the newer members from the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and citizens' military training camps, thus insuring an adequate officer personnel to assume the responsible duties of junior officers in the event of a mobilization.

3. We are in favor of the continuation of summer training for the Organized Reserves, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the National Guard, the citizens' military training camps, and the National Rifle Matches.

National Rifle Matches.

4. We are opposed to the reduction of field and armory drill pay of the National Guard.

It is sincerely requested that unanimous consent be obtained to place this statement in the Congressional Record.

Very sincerely,

Don E. Engdahl, President Spokane Chapter, Reserve Officers' Association.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 18, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, teach us to pray, for without prayer there can not be any richness of experience or abiding depth of character; just now do Thou hear our prayer. In this restful moment may there be a withdrawal from the rivalries, defeats, and triumphs of life, and also from the fever of living; continue with us this day. Let our souls be at home with themselves in the spirit of contemplation. O keep us from that spiritual paralysis in which the soul no longer leaps and climbs toward God. Father, hearken; crown our virtues with the power of faith-faith in ideals, in principles, in moral causes, and in spiritual forces. Preserve our land from a destructive materialism that thrives on selfishness. Crush the seeds of ill will in the soil of our country, and everywhere may the surplus of one become a blessing to the other. This day let Thy work appear unto Thy servants and Thy glory unto their children. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I submit a unanimousconsent request.

The Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that in the reading of the pending revenue bill, H. R. 10236, the reading of the table of contents (pp. 2 to 6, both inclusive) be dispensed with, and that in the engrossing of the bill the Clerk of the House be authorized to make such changes in such table of contents as may be necessary to make such table conform to the action of the House in respect of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it not rather novel to have the table of contents enacted into legislation? Is there any particular purpose in it? I am only inquiring.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend from New York that it was in the 1928 act. The purpose of it is that in the consideration of this bill there will probably be some changes made in the bill. The purpose of my request is to permit the Clerk in engrossing the bill to make the necessary changes to conform to the action of the Committee of the Whole in amending the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There could be no sound objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I submit another unanimousconsent request.

The Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossing of the pending revenue bill (H. R. 10236) the Clerk of the House be authorized—

(1) To make such clerical changes as may be necessary to the proper numbering and lettering of the various portions of the bill, and to secure uniformity in the bill in respect of typography indentation; and ) To amend or strike out cross references that have become erroneous or superfluous, and to insert cross references made necessary by reason of changes made by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker. I may say that a similar request was made in connection with the bill of 1928. It is simply for the purpose of having the bill engrossed in accordance with the action the House takes instead of going back each time and getting permission to make the neces-

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that the gentleman from Georgia has certainly displayed foresight in anticipating changes.

Mr. CRISP. I have no doubt that some of the amendments the committee itself will propose will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In the reading of this bill the Chair will direct the Clerk to read it section by section instead of by paragraphs.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary in-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Do I understand the Chair to announce that the bill will be read by sections and not by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. May I inquire whether it is not customary to read revenue bills by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is precedent for the action just taken by the Chair. When the revenue bill of 1928 was under consideration this procedure was followed and the then chairman of the committee directed this procedure.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, the Clerk will read an entire section and then amendments may be offered paragraph by paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments may be offered to any paragraph of the section.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be read by paragraphs and not by sections. It is obvious we will be at a disadvantage and will be thrown into confusion if we must follow the reading of a long paragraph dealing with several different propositions. Confusion will arise in the offering of amendments and we will be placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. CRISP. I do not see how Members will be placed at a disadvantage. I have no desire, and neither has the committee any desire, to prevent any Member of the House from offering any amendment to any paragraph of the bill. When a section has been read it will then be in order for any Member to offer amendments to any paragraph of that section, and I do not see how that would lead to any confusion.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When the Clerk reads the income-tax provision there will be scores of amendments offered and if the bill were read by paragraphs, the Members could offer their amendments at the proper place.

Mr. CRISP. I think my friend may have an erroneous idea about this. It is not the intention to read the whole of the income-tax title; it is just to read a section, and there are many sections in the income-tax provision.

Mr. SNELL. I think we should understand what the chairman thinks a section is.

Mr. CRISP. I will state to my distinguished friend from New York the bill itself gives the sections by number.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I hope the gentleman will not press that. It is going to be extremely difficult to legislate orderly by reading these entire sections.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from New York will! indulge the Chair a moment, as the Chair stated, this action was not taken by the present occupant of the chair as an original proposition. When the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Newton, a former Member of the House, was Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the revenue act of 1928, this same question arose, and after some colloquy between the minority leader at that time, the present Speaker of the House, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, it was determined that, probably, as a matter of mechanical expedition in the consideration of the bill, the saving of time on the part of the reading clerk, and for other practical reasons, it was thought best that that procedure should be followed, and the Chairman directed the Clerk to read the bill by sections. The Chair, however, feels that it is his duty to submit the unanimous-consent request submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia].

Is there objection to the request that the bill be read by major paragraphs instead of by sections?

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if it is read by paragraphs would that mean the reading of three lines like $1,560 of net income or $3,400 of net income? Would that constitute a particular paragraph?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] knows my theory about the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will pardon the Chair, the Chairman would feel, for instance, on page 9 of the bill, the paragraphs under section 12 would not be read down to the first three lines, but would include the reading of all of paragraph (a). That is a major paragraph of the section.

Mr. FULLER. It would not include the reading of the three or four pages there, would it?

The CHAIRMAN. In that illustration, of course, the Chair would feel, that being substantive amounts, each paragraph would be read item by item. I do not think there will be any misapprehension on the part of the Chair about the unanimous-consent request. However, if it is desired to clarify the matter further before consent is given, that ought to be done.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I understand the decision that the Chair has just rendered? Starting on page 9, section 12, as an illustration, there is a subsection (a) beginning at rates of surtax. Now, subsection (b) is near the bottom of page 14. Does the Chair inform us that before any amendment can be offered to the surtax paragraph (a) the Clerk will continue on reading through line 18 on page 14?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon reconsideration, the Chair would feel that that was covered by the request of the gentleman from New York and would read all of that, and would then read subsection (b) which follows on page 14.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, personally, I am not going to object to the request. I wish the members of the committee to have every opportunity possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that the bill be read by major paragraphs as indicated by the Chair?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following unanimous-consent request, which is customary in the consideration of bills of this kind.

The Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of the pending revenue bill (H. R. 10236) in the Committee of the Whole it shall be in order at any time for the Committee on Ways and Means to return to any section or paragraph of the bill which has been passed for the purpose of offering an amendment thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act, divided into titles and sections according to the following table of contents, may be cited as the revenue act of 1932."

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman from New York offering an amendment? Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes; striking out the last word.

There seems to have been a rather deliberate attempt to confuse the membership on the anticipated revenues for the year 1931. Of course, the revenue from income of 1931 at its best can only be an estimate. Whether or not these estimates were officially considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, of course, I do not know, but I do know that a very conservative estimate has been made and that the information was available and known to the membership of the committee.

The Treasury Department has these estimates, members of the Ways and Means Committee know them, and these are based on a most drastic reduction from the last available returns after proper comparisons made. The estimate is most conservative.

I want to submit that the estimate for 1931 on incomes of between $100,000 and $150,000 is $267,000,000. If the members will refer to the 1930 figures they will readily see that this is a most conservative estimate. Then in the brackets between $150,000 and $300,000 the estimate for 1931 is $280,000,000. In the brackets between $300,000 and $500,000 the estimate for 1931 is $133,000,000. In the brackets between $500,000 and $1,000,000 the estimated income is $124,-000,000, and over $1,000,000 it is $202,000,000. In other words, the total estimate of total incomes from the $100,000 bracket up to the very biggest income over $1,000,000 is no less than $1,006,000,000.

I know that many Members are preparing amendments based upon these estimated incomes and the RECORD up to this day, strange enough, is rather bare of this very important and necessary information. I thought it would be useful for the House to know these figures and have them in the RECORD. If gentlemen will obtain the statistics of income for 1931, a preliminary report compiled from income returns up to August 31, 1931, they will there find the lastknown accurate returns in these corresponding brackets.

Here are the comparisons:

Amounts of income in 1930 based on returns filed August 31, 1931 change to the commence of a sur- tance no the commence beauty	Total	Estimated for 1932

Incomes between— $100,000 and under $150,000 $150,000 and under $390,000 $300,000 and under $500,000 $500,000 and under $1,000,000 $1,000,000 and over	$371, 489, 432 415, 013, 505 203, 898, 805 207, 742, 387 355, 661, 694	$267, 000, 000 280, 000, 000 133, 000, 000 124, 000, 000 202, 000, 000

Surely all must admit that sufficient allowance has been made for reduced incomes.

I point out these figures to indicate that the figures I have given are very conservative estimates. I, for one, refuse to subscribe, even for the purpose of considering this most unscientific tax bill, that the country is absolutely and hopelessly bankrupt. It is not. The figures I have given will indicate that the source of incomes that may be taxed have by no means entirely disappeared. They are still a source for additional taxation from which needed revenue can be obtained.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. From what source does the gentleman get his figures?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. From the same source as did the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I notice the gentleman read from a

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The same source as the Ways and Means Committee got their figures. They have been in the newspapers, in the Treasury Department recommendations to the committee; every place except in the Congressional

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. This revenue bill should provide revenue only from sources that are constitutional. Under the rules of the House, and of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, any amendment that is offered to this bill that is germane must be held in order by the Chairman of the committee and by the Speaker of the House, regardless of how much it is against the constitutional law of the land. Because neither the Speaker nor the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union have anything to do with the constitutionality of a proposed amendment.

I want to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that it is really important that all of us should realize when there is such an amendment that is against the Constitution offered from the floor that we who are in favor of supporting the Constitution should be here and vote it down

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York is with me; and I only want to yield to those who are against me. I think the gentleman from New York is entitled to the commendation of the mothers and fathers of America for the stand he has taken.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I thank the gentleman; there is no question about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. There will be offered an amendment proposing a tax on beer. As was said by Mr. Lemann, the ultrawet member of President Hoover's Wickersham Commission; if beer is intoxicating it is against the Constitution; and unless it is intoxicating, nobody wants it, as it does not satisfy.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not speaking to the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the gentleman from Texas will proceed in order, which is to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. The last word is the revenue bill for 1932. and that embraces everything that is in the bill. It embraces every germane amendment that can be offered toward providing revenue.

I submit, and I think my friend from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] will agree with me, that any germane amendment is germane to his pro forma amendment, and I am speaking against that. I am speaking against the position of the gentleman from New York, which is to try to place a beer rider on this bill. Mr. Chairman, I have performed my duty, I have finished my purpose, to urge every dry to be present when the beer amendment is offered, and help to vote it down. I hope that every Member of the House in favor of the Constitution will be here when that beer amendment is offered. We know that all of the wets will be here en masse, without one of their number missing; and unless all drys are here to outvote them, they would pass this beer amendment. Our vote here is the only thing that will stop them, as their amendment is not subject to a point of order. however much it contravenes the Constitution of the United States

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. CLASSIFICATION OF PROVISIONS

The provisions of this title are herein classified and designated as

Subtitle A—Introductory provisions, Subtitle B—General provisions, divided into parts and sections, Subtitle C—Supplemental provisions, divided into supplements

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia if the unanimous-consent request which was granted to the gentleman from Georgia, permitting a return to sections, applies to the committee only or to any Member of the House?

Mr. CRISP. It applied only to the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But I assume, of course, that if there should be any drastic change in the bill as we go along, requiring reference back, the committee would entertain suggestions from Members?

Mr. CRISP. I think I have demonstrated to the gentleman that I am trying to be very fair in this bill and give each Member an opportunity to have his say; and certainly if a Member proposed a bona fide amendment to some section that has been passed, I should not object to it. The request that was made was made not for any individual Member but for the committee collectively when it, as a whole, desired to offer an amendment to permit them to return to it; and that is customary. But I do not think the membership of this House will find occasion to object to my course relative to giving them an opportunity to offer amend-

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say that I must be constantly on my guard lest I be totally disarmed by the gentleman's courtesy and fairness. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. NORMAL TAX ON INDIVIDUALS

There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual a normal tax equal to the sum of the following:

(a) Two per cent of the first $4,000 of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 25;

Four per cent of the next $4,000 of such excess amount: and (c) Six per cent of the remainder of such excess amount.

Mr. LaGUARDIA offered the following amendment:

On page 9, line 12, strike out the figure "6" and insert the gure "7"

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this is our first amendment as an indication of the willingness of some of us who are bitterly opposing the sales tax to meet the demands requiring additional revenue.

The increase of 1 per cent provided for in this amendment runs through every schedule of the income-tax brackets. It is a revenue raiser. It hits every bracket and every possible class of income.

We refuse to be placed in the position of seeking to destroy without building. We refuse to be placed in the position of opposing one of the provisions recommended by the committee, the sales tax, and having no substitute. On the other hand, we are going to stand up and fight against placing all of the burden of the deficit on the working people of this country by making them pay a sales tax or, as has been suggested, by taking it out of their wages. [Applause.]

No more drastic threat was ever made than that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who, I am sure, overstated himself when he said: "A sales tax must be imposed or a reduction in salaries will follow."

Oh, the gentleman did not mean any such thing, although he said it on the floor and repeated it yesterday on the radio. We know the gentleman from Illinois too well. The gentleman can not brush aside and destroy the confidence and love that we who have served with him here for 14 years have for him by a statement made in a desperate effort to plead a lost cause. Oh, if you could open the heart of the gentleman from Illinois you would not find anything on sales tax there-nothing but love for the oppressed and the exploited would be found in the gentleman's heart. I say I am sure the gentleman did not carefully measure or consider his statement when he said: "A sales tax or a reduction in pay." I will defend the gentleman from Illinois, from my acquaintance and association with him, from any such threat; but I will say that the gentleman did, unconsciously, I am sure, express the sentiments of a small class of people in this country who have tried to ruin our country, who came here with the same threat and said: "Pass the reconstruction finance bill or we will close our banks and bring ruin to the holders of our investments." Now, they are saying, "Balance the Budget the way we tell you or we will close business and let the workers starve." That is the threat—to take it out of the working people of this country. We will balance the Budget without resorting to iniquities and without taxing the food and clothes of the people of this country.

Now, here is an amendment. I will take the figures which were given by the gentleman from Georgia as to the amount that an increase of 1 per cent in the normal tax would bring. This is our first test. I appeal to the membership of the House. This is the greatest crisis we have ever been in, because for the last 15 years those who control our industries and finances have been attempting to write on our statute books this iniquitous and un-American sales tax in order to be relieved of the just burden of the expense of government that they should bear. This is our first attack on the sales tax. I urge support of my amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the expert, Mr. Parker, advises me, from a rapid calculation, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York would produce in revenue for the fiscal year 1933 probably about $12,000,000 additional; and for a full year he estimates it will produce $20,000,000. All I have to say about this is that the committee considered the income-tax schedule as a whole. The committee reduced the provisions for earned income where they were allowed a deduction from $30,000 to $12,000. The committee doubled the rate on the surtax. The committee has recommended to cut down the exemption for married men from $3,500 to $2,500. The committee has recommended cutting the exemption for single men from $1,500 to $1,000. One who is fortunate enough to have a very large income, above $100,000, under the terms of this bill would pay 46 per cent income tax on his excess of $100,000. Unfortunately, with conditions of business, it is impossible to raise money to balance the Budget in 1933 from income taxes, individual and corporate, from the estate taxes, and gift taxes. Unfortunately, if the money is to be raised, there must be some taxes—excise tax or manufacturers' tax. By whatever name you call it, they are sales taxes. Whether it is a tax on gasoline, oil, an automobile, or a tariff on tobacco, they are sales taxes.

Of necessity, with additional taxes levied, the man with a small income must make some contribution under the scheme of this bill to finance the Government, and with all of that picture before us the committee thought the boost of the normal rate from 1½ to 2 on the first bracket, from 3 to 4 on the next bracket, and from 5 to 6 on the next bracket was sufficiently high. Of course, it is up to this committee to decide whether or not they desire to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP) there were—ayes 92, noes 68.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. La-Guardia and Mr. Crisp to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 121, noes 81.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Canfield: On page 14, strike out lines 16, 17, and 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$20,100 upon net incomes of $100,000; and upon net incomes

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. PATTERSON. When would it be in order to offer an amendment to the amendment-before or after the gentleman from Indiana speaks?

The CHAIRMAN. After the gentleman from Indiana has concluded his remarks.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, as the bill has been recommended to you by the Ways and Means Committee the surtax stops at 40 per cent, and on all incomes over $100,000 they will pay a surtax of 40 per cent. This means that they will pay approximately 47 per cent on incomes over $100,000. My amendment goes on up to $500,000, and on incomes over $200,000 there will be paid a surtax of 43 per cent; on incomes over $300,000, a surtax of 46 per cent; on incomes over $400,000, a surtax of 48 per cent; and on incomes over $500,000, 50 per cent. This will make the normal tax and surtax on incomes of over $500,000 approximately 57 per cent. I realize the argument is often made that 40 per cent is as high as we should go; that more income can be derived by stopping at 40 per cent than by going higher. I can not agree with that argument. With conditions as they are to-day, with an emergency existing, I feel that any man who has an income of over $500,000 should be willing to pay 57 per cent of it into the Treasury. For if it were not for the Government that is back of him, he could not make $500,000 a year. Therefore when he is allowed to make over $500,000 a year there is no reason on earth why he should not be willing to at least pay 57 per cent of it into the Treasury of the United States, when the facts are if it were not for his Government back of him it would not be possible for him to accomplish what he does.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I will.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does not the gentleman think, to carry his amendment to a logical conclusion, he should make the increase of surtax 1 per cent for every $100,000 until he gets to 100 per cent?

Mr. CANFIELD. No; I think when we go to 57 per cent we have gone as high as we should go.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Can the gentleman give us any idea about what increased revenue his amendment would

Mr. CANFIELD. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Parker and the Treasury Department estimate that the increase in revenue will be between $10,000,000 and $15,000,000 in 1933 and between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000 in 1934. The increase $16,250 upon net incomes of $90,000; and upon net incomes in 1 in revenue is not large or will not be large on account of excess of $90,000 and not in excess of $95,000, 38 per cent in addiconditions as they are at present, but should conditions improve the revenue will increase.

> Mr. HASTINGS. Why does not the gentleman increase the bracket from $500,000 up to the $1,000,000 class?

> Mr. CANFIELD. Because I think when we go to 57 per cent we have gone high enough, and instead of going to the million-dollar class to get 57 per cent, I believe we should collect 57 per cent on all income over $500,000.

> Mr. HASTINGS. I am in favor of an amendment to go higher, and if I have the opportunity I shall offer an amendment to carry the higher brackets up to $1,000,000.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I will.

Mr. HARLAN. Can the gentleman give any information as to the British income-tax rates on those brackets?

Mr. CANFIELD. They are very high.

Mr. HARLAN. I know they are, and I wondered if the gentleman had the figures.

Mr. CANFIELD. I think they go as high as 66% per cent. Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Swing: Page 14, line 17, strike out lines 17 and 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Net incomes in excess of $100,000 and not in excess of $150,000, 40 per cent in addition of such excess.

"42 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $150,000 and do not exceed $200,000.

"44 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $200,000 and do not exceed $250,000.

"46 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $250,000 and do not exceed $300,000.

"48 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $250,000 and do not exceed $300,000.

"48 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $300,000 and do not exceed $400,000. "50 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $400,000 and do not exceed $500,000.

52 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $500,000 and do not exceed $750,000.

"54 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $750,000 and do not exceed $1,000,000.

"58 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $1,000,000 and do not exceed $1,500,000.
"58 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $1,500,000 and do not exceed $2,000,000.

"60 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed

$2,000,000 and do not exceed $3,000,000. "62 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $3,000,000 and do not exceed $4,000,000.

"64 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $4,000,000 and do not exceed $5,000,000.

"65 per cent of the amount by which the net incomes exceed $5,000,000."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Indiana has an amendment pending striking out certain lines of the bill and substituting different rates. As I caught the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, it also struck out those same lines. Of course, there can not be two amendments pending, and my parliamentary inquiry is whether the gentleman from California offered his amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair, that the gentleman offers his proposal as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. Every argument that can be made in favor of a graduated income tax up to $100,000 or $500,000 can be repeated to show that the graduation ought to go on up to $5,000,000. I am simply presenting to this House the opportunity to vote for the financial needs of the country in the present great crisis just as it voted in 1918, facing a similar crisis.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How do these rates compare with the surtax rates in effect during the World War?

Mr. SWING. I have taken the rates in my amendment from the war tax rates of the revenue bill of 1918.

The crisis facing the country to-day has brought more want and suffering on the American people than the World War did. This depression has cost the American people more in financial losses than the World War cost us in money. So I say that in this war against depression there can be no serious objection to going back to the World War to find tax rates then adopted, with the approval of the American people, and again putting them into effect.

During the World War when man power was essential to win the contest this country did not hesitate to take man power where it could find it and used only the yardstick of ability to fight. Now, when it needs dollar power to balance its Budget, who is there that can justly complain if for a limited period of time we impose a justifiable graduated income tax which applies to the upper brackets identically the same yardstick that is applied to the lower brackets? [Applause.]

How are we going to answer the contention of the International Workers of the World and such, who claim that this Government has one treatment for the classes and another treatment for the masses? That we have one yard-stick for the rich and another yardstick for the poor?

In India they have a class of untouchables, but they are at the bottom of society. Let us not create in the minds of our people the belief that we have a class of untouchables at the top, of the rich.

If ability to pay is a proper basis—and it is the only basis on which the graduated income taxes are imposed—why stop at incomes of $100,000 as you do in this bill. Why do you not have to carry that same yardstick on up and apply it to those incomes in the upper brackets?

Five thousand eight hundred taxpayers, according to the records of 1930, a year of depression, reported net incomes in excess of $100,000, running up to $5,000,000 and over.

How can a man with an income of $5,000,000 object to contributing to his country in the time of this great need 65 per cent of that part only of his income which is in excess of $5,000,000?

I say this amendment will produce, according to the records, for a full year, $120,000,000. It is proper and it is justifiable to ask for these increases, and we have precedent for asking men with such incomes to pay a larger tax to the country during its hour of great need. The amendment should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and to the substitute. Gentlemen, I want us to consider this particular feature in a very sober and business-like way. I realize the House wants to make those who have the ability to pay, pay the taxes of this country.

I was appointed the chairman of the subcommittee which framed these particular rates in the bill. We had the advantage of experts not only of the House and of the Treasury but, as I recall it, we called in one or two other men to counsel with us. The rates we have here represent what the men on that committee thought under the circumstances would bring in the greatest amount of money it was possible to collect under these incomes.

Now, you can put in rates, if you want to, calling for 90 per cent of their income, but you will not get 90 per cent. You can put in rates calling for 80 or 70 per cent, and you can even put in a rate of 60 per cent, but whenever you do that, particularly in this day of stress, you are going to far overreach the point where you will get any returns.

Now, the conditions that my friend from California and my friend from Indiana spoke of were conditions in war times, entirely different from what we have to-day.

Those were the conditions when we were in war. Prices and salaries and wages in every respect were exceedingly high. Prices of commodities at that time were tremendously out of proportion to prices in normal times, and so men, through patriotic impulses, with pocketbooks bulging with money, could afford to pay these tremendous rates, but what are you confronted with to-day?

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. No; I can not yield now. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

With conditions as they exist now, with the money of the country sewed up, even to the smallest taxpayer in the country who, if he has an extra dollar, has it sewed up in a sock or hid in a sugar bowl, and this condition extends from him right on up to the multimillionaires of the country, and everyone is fearful, and what are you going to do?

If you put on a tax higher than those in the committee's report here—and remember, gentlemen, the committee's report is a 46 per cent tax on every man's income where it is above $100,000—if you put a higher tax upon it, what will be the result? The result will be just what you could expect human nature to be. The man will say that he will take care of himself, and he will put his money in tax-exempt securities, and you know that he has that golden opportunity at this time.

So I know this House wants to produce, through the instrumentality of a tax bill, especially upon those of wealth, a bill that will produce the greatest amount of revenue, and I say to you that in place of encouraging volumes of money to roll into the Treasury, under the proposals you make, if you enact the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana or if you enact the amendment of the gentleman from California, you will reach the point with respect to this particular bill where you will find yourselves in the throes of diminishing returns.

I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman spoke of pockets bulging with money during the war. I wonder if the gentleman knows that in 1928 there were twenty-five times as many people in the United States with incomes of $1,000,000 a year as there were during the war.

Mr. RAGON. However reprehensible, I will say to my friend from Mississippi, it may be to grow rich in this country; however reprehensible it may be for a man to step out of a salary of $10,000 into a salary of $20,000, or from a salary of $2,000 into a salary of $10,000—

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGON. However reprehensible it may be for a man, by his initiative or otherwise, to gain a larger income upon his ability or a larger return upon his investments, I say to my friend, that does not alter the case a bit in the world. You have got to meet this situation in respect to tax returns and realize the fact that you can go too far, and I say to you that I am as willing as anybody to go to the limit to make those able to pay bear the cost of government; but five of us sat around the table and then the entire committee joined in, and, without a dissenting vote, we agreed that this was as much as the traffic would bear.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would like the gentleman to tell me why the subcommittee stopped at $100,000 and levied the same percentage of tax on $100,000 that they do on $1,000,-000 or $5,000,000?

Mr. RAGON. I will say to the gentleman that we just thought a flat rate would be as equitable as anything else in the matter.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to ask the gentleman one more question, if the gentleman will yield, and then I shall not bother him any more.

Mr. RAGON. That is all right.

Mr. PATTERSON. I notice where the gentleman made a speech here when we had up the gift-tax measure in December, 1929, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the gentleman made an enthusiastic speech for that, and that very year, with the moneys collected after July 1 of that year, we had a deficit of $900,000,000.

Mr. RAGON. I do not know who got the speech for the gentleman, but that is correct. I do not know that I have done anything here that the gentleman should want to quarrel with any speech I have made, but I wish to God we had now the same opportunity to pass the same kind of | bill. [Applause.] A bunch of fellows like my friend from Alabama must stop and realize that if we are going to pay these appropriations he wants it, we have got to have some money.

Mr. PATTERSON. And that is what we are trying to do. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is out of order in addressing the speaker without rising and asking him to yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman was addressing me.

Mr. RAGON. When it comes to the question of the returns, as my friend from Mississippi suggested here, we are faced with the condition that in the last year we have had a reduction of 52 per cent on the returns from the individual income taxes of this country, and this year it is expected there will be still further reductions. I do not know, and perhaps some gentleman can correct me if I am wrong, but as I remember it, the return on individual incomes in 1929 was about $1,100,000,000. Approximately, that was reduced in the income returns in 1930 to $475,000,000, and I am advised that this year the Treasury Department expects not more than $350,000,000.

To-day, when everyone is scared, when money is timid, when the greatest financiers of the world are afraid of their shadows, financially speaking, the prettiest thing in the world is a tax-exempt security, and if you want to drive this money that we would otherwise get under a tax rate of 46 per cent into tax-exempt securities or into hiding, then vote for either the amendment of my friend from Indiana or the amendment of my friend from California.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman say what effect he anticipates on the interest rate that the Government would have to pay on the tax-free securities the rush to purchase such tax-free securities would have? Would not that lower the interest the United States Government would have to pay on its tax-free securities and increase the price the Government would get for them?

Mr. RAGON. I grant the gentleman's reasoning and that would depend, largely, upon your ability to balance the Budget and to avoid further bond issues.

Mr. MANLOVE. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to say in answer to the question that even if there were a slight reduction in the rate of interest the Government would have to pay, that would not be comparable at all with the amount of money which the Government would lose by reason of this money going into tax-exempt securities.

Mr. RAGON. That is true.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall most cheerfully support the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. Swing]. I remember back in the days of 1918, when the gentleman from California and I were in the service together, and I agree with him that the condition of this country is much more serious to-day, especially from an economic standpoint, than it was then.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] tells us that conditions were entirely different at that time. I have put the tables in the RECORD showing that in 1914, the year the war broke out, there were only 60 people in the United States with incomes of a million dollars a year. In 1921 there were 21 people with incomes of a million dollars a year. In 1928 there were 511 individuals with incomes of a million dollars a year-twenty-four times as many as there were in 1921.

The very laws that you have imposed on the American people have made the masses of the people poorer and poorer, until they finally reached the bread line, while these men have piled up incomes amounting to a million dollars annually. Yet you come here and propose-even the gentleman from Arkansas proposes-to levy a sales tax on the masses of the American people that will average $25 a year on the poorest family in America that only has sufficient money to buy necessities to live on. You levy $25 a year, which is 100 per cent or more of their net incomes, but you are very solicitous when the attempt is made to enact a tax that will reach the individual with a million-dollar income and over.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes. Mr. RAGON. How does the gentleman get those figures of $25 a year?

Mr. RANKIN. Because the average family in America has five people, and you levy a tax of $5 on each individual, and that makes $25 a year, whether they have any incomes or not. You can not escape that conclusion.

Mr. RAGON. What does the gentleman base that on? Mr. RANKIN. Oh, if the gentleman does not know any more about the bill than that, it is useless to argue with him. It averages $5 a year per capita, and, pyramided as it will be, it will probably amount to $10 a year.

The gentleman from Arkansas talks of driving the wealth into tax-exempt securities. Well, we are ready for that storm cellar too. We are going to offer an amendment at the proper time raising the surtax on those who inherit large fortunes. We are not going to permit them to escape.

This is war. It is war on poverty; it is war on depression. The way to solve it is to relieve the masses from the burden of taxation and make those pay who are able to pay.

There has not been a more fair and just amendment than this offered by the distinguished gentleman from California. The gentleman from Arkansas, instead of answering my question when I said there were more people with a milliondollar income now than there were during the war, said that I thought it was reprehensible for a man to have a large income. I did not say and I do not think it is reprehensible for a man to have a large income, but it is reprehensible to impose unbearable burdens upon the toiling masses of our people and allow those to escape who are most able to pay. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And what we ought to do before we adjourn is to start to the legislatures a resolution to amend our Constitution allowing income from tax-exempt securities to be taxed and to keep tax evaders from investing all of their money in tax-free securities.

Mr. RANKIN. We will take care of that later. We are faced with a condition and not with a theory. You may impose a sales tax, and it will not lower the burden at all of the men in your States, it will not lower the burden of the man who is trying to pay taxes on his home but will add to his burden. We are driven to one of two things. will have to either raise the rates in the higher brackets or impose a sales tax on these people who are already overburdened and complete their economic destruction. one expect to support this Swing amendment, to raise these rates to 65 per cent, because when you get men with large incomes paying their just proportion of the taxes, we will not hurt them. Invariably they made their fortunes out of the war to which the gentleman referred, and we are at war now. We must save this Republic, and I resent the insinuations that have been passed out that those of us who are fighting to keep down the sales tax are not just as patriotic as those who are fighting to put it on. [Applause.]

We were elected to Congress just as you gentlemen were. and we are not going to be dictated to by any man who arrogates to himself all of the patriotism, all of the intelligence, and all of the statesmanship of the Republic. We are going to continue this fight, to keep you from imposing this unjust, iniquitous burden called a sales tax on the backs of the toiling masses and permitting those with incomes of millions of dollars a year to escape. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, no more serious problem can face this committee than the one suggested by the two amendments now pending. Of course the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing] will come up first for action, and, therefore, I shall confine my brief remarks to the principle involved in that. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Rankin], who has just taken his seat, very eloquently tells this House that we are going after this money in somebody's hands. That is exactly what the Committee on Ways and Means has endeavored to do. The point at issue is whether or not we will get more money out of the people under the rates as reported by the Committee on Ways and Means or by the amendments that are pending before the House now.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I have only five minutes.

Mr. PARSONS. Just for a question.

Mr. TREADWAY. Very well.

Mr. PARSONS. If this is not going to produce the revenue, nobody will have to pay the money, and why worry

Mr. TREADWAY. We are very much worried, under the situation, with the gentleman offering these amendments, that they will absolutely prevent the reconstruction of business in the country.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. The only way that I can afford to yield is based on securing more time.

Mr. PARSONS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, did not the gentleman vote for these same rates during the war?

Mr. TREADWAY. I did.
Mr. BLANTON. Then why object to them now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman says that this will drive the corporations and these people with large incomes out of business, and they will invest their money in tax-free securities. Is it not a fact that there are no new tax-free securities being issued except those of the Federal Government, and where would there be any to make the investment?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not admit the gentleman's premise that no other tax-free securities are being issued.

Mr. PARSONS. In large amounts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Because, under a recent decision of the Supreme Court, the Federal Government has no right to tax the instrumentalities of the State, and I read a paragraph to the committee in that connection from the Supreme Court decision in Willcuts v. Bunn (282 U. S. 216):

The well-established principle is invoked that a tax on the instrumentalities of the State is forbidden by the Federal Constitution, the exemption resting on necessary implication in order to effectually maintain our dual system of government.

In other words, the reason why these large incomes have shrunk, so far as returns to the Federal Government are concerned, is that the possessors of those large incomes can buy State securities that are tax exempt. There are no two ways about that. It is so plain that it seems peculiar to me that gentlemen will suggest these confiscatory rates, and in addition to the State securities, the municipal securities are likewise exempt under the Supreme Court decision. The Committee on Ways and Means has considered this question in previous years. The same question was up before the committee in 1921, and in 1923 the Committee on Ways and Means reported to this House a resolution proposing to amend the Federal Constitution to cover this very point. The House of Representatives adopted that proposal, and we are not to blame if the resolution did not go into effect and died in another branch of the Congress. The House of Representatives did its part in asking that the constitutional amendment be referred to the States. In my remarks a week ago I said that I considered there was no more necessary amendment to the Federal Constitution than that very one, so that we may provide a means whereby the tax-free securities can not be bought up in the way they have been in the past, and thereby prevent securing the revenue that would result from the higher brackets.

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means placed the higher bracket of surtax at 40 per cent. The House has just adopted an amendment making the normal tax 7 per cent. Therefore, on the income above $100,000 you will be asking the man of large means to pay into the Federal Treasury 47 per cent of that income.

I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] that the moment we try to get higher rates than that, we will have exactly the same situation that faced Congress when we adopted that amendment to the Constitution, as far as the House was concerned, nearly 10 years ago. That is the problem with regard to which I appeal to you, not to discourage the renewal of business; not to discourage the renewal of placing these large sums of money into business channels; not urging those people to take from their strong boxes and buy State and municipal securities rather than go into business or buy Federal bonds.

The moment you increase those rates beyond what the patriotic citizens feel is a fair return on their part to the Federal Government, just so soon are you reducing the amounts that the Federal Government will be able to obtain. Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that this payment on their part is voluntary. They are protected by the Federal Constitution and by decisions of the Supreme Court so that we can not force them to pay these higher brackets. If we could, that would be one thing, but offering an amendment to the committee bill on this floor will not do it. Therefore, I appeal to the membership not to consider raising that rate.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I do not yield at this time. The gentleman can get his own time.

I appeal to the House not to think we can arbitrarily force this money out of the coffers of the so-called wealthy. It is impossible, and the Supreme Court and the Constitution of the United States under the decisions of the Supreme Court. protect them in the position that they will take. You will lower governmental receipts. We are looking for money. You will lower Federal returns just as sure as you increase these higher brackets on the surtax. [Applause.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, it has been my purpose to offer an amendment fashioned along the war-time rates, which appear in the public laws of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and of which I ask permission to include a portion, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, for purposes of comparison.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated repeatedly during this debate that net incomes of $100,000 are taxed at the rate of 40 per cent.

If the members of the committee will refer to the copy of the bill in their hands, they will readily see that net incomes of $100,000 are not taxed at the rate of 40 per cent, but are taxed with a surtax of approximately 20 per cent, which, with the normal tax recently determined upon by adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New York raising the normal tax rate to 7 per cent, makes a total tax of 27 per cent. That portion of the income, net, for taxable purposes, in excess of $100,000, is taxed at the rate of 40 per cent. That is quite different.

Now, the same applies in the case of incomes, net, of $50,000. Instead of the 21 per cent, commonly designated, the actual rate is about 15 per cent; and so on through these figures that appear before you in the bill. Rates are substantially lower than it is generally represented.

I think the reference to the specific sums to be paid has been an effort on the part of those drafting this legislation to be honest, and not to be misleading. Specific amounts are named for each bracket. Now, the effort of the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing] and of the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. Canfield], and my own effort in the way of an amendment which I have decided to withdraw, and in its stead to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from California as a substitute, are all designed to increase rates upon those incomes in excess of $100,000. The wartime rates were stepped up until a surtax of 65 per cent upon an annual income of $1,000,000 was reached.

The arguments that these will be nonproductive rates if set in the legislation, it seems to me, are quite beside the point. The main point should be that, as an evidence of good faith on the part of gentlemen who are here advocating the imposition of a sales tax, they should be the first to support this amendment. The reason for imposing these additional rates upon these large incomes is only that, in imposing the sales tax upon the masses of the people, it is evidence of good faith, and even though they may not be productive of substantial revenue to the Treasury, yet we should write these large rates into the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman to say that on incomes above $100,000 we would only tax them 26 per cent.

Mr. KVALE. On incomes of $100,000 net, for taxable purposes.

Mr. SNELL. I had supposed from the report of the committee that it was 47 per cent.

Mr. KVALE. I ask the gentleman to refer to the bill. There appears a surtax of $20,100 upon net incomes of $100,000. Is that not a surtax of 20 per cent? There is no argument about it.

Mr. SNELL. Now, I will ask a member of the committee, who is supposed to be able to answer that.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will permit-

Mr. KVALE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. The tax on page 12 of the reprint, line 4—I am referring to what we are amending—reads as follows:

$11,660 upon net incomes of $100,000, and upon net incomes in excess of $100,000, in addition, 20 per cent of such excess.

Now, that is the present law. The suggestion of the committee is, as found on page 17 of print in italics, $20,100 upon net incomes of $100,000.

In other words, this bill, if adopted as the committee reports it, raises the income rate on $100,000, $8,550.

Mr. KVALE. That is all correct, but it does not controvert the statements I have made here.

Mr. TREADWAY. But I am endeavoring to show to the gentleman that we are nearly doubling the rate at $20,000, and from $20,000 up we have more than doubled it.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. On page 7 of the report of the committee is a tabulation showing exactly what will be paid under the present proposed bill.

It shows this: Net income, $100,000; tax proposed, $25,-762.50.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman bears out my statement, and I thank him.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts, after his explanation, agreed that the gentleman was right.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I agree the gentleman was correct in his statement, but I was endeavoring to show the gentleman that in the bill we have increased that rate on an income of $100,000 by over $8,000.

Mr. KVALE. That is right.

Mr. TREADWAY. We are both correct, are we not?

Mr. KVALE. Perhaps so.

Mr. CANFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. CANFIELD. And all incomes over $100,000 are taxed 40 per cent.

Mr. KVALE. Yes. The gentleman from Indiana is seeking to make these rates more equitable, and the gentleman from California, in harmony with my thought, goes yet farther, and I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. TREADWAY. We are not in discord at all, but we are in agreement as to the rate on $100,000 and that the rate is 40 per cent above $100,000.

Mr. KVALE. Permit me to make one concluding statement. Mr. Chairman, these rates may not be productive of great additional revenue—although I am advised that the figure approaches $80,000,000. Mark you, these rates apply only to net annual income, for taxable purposes, after individuals declaring these large incomes have already made all possible exemptions, deductions, allowances, exceptions, and have concealed all possible income through purchase of tax-free securities.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fair to apply these rates upon these incomes, whether they be productive or not, as a demonstration of good faith on our part if we seek to impose a sales tax, and I repeat that those who advocate a sales tax should be the first to follow the gentlemen from California and Indiana and those of us who support this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall detain you but a moment. I have no criticism to make and have had none to make of any Member of this House who has differed with me on this or any other bill. The majority has a right to work its will.

I do want to ask you, however, for one moment to please seriously consider what will be the effect of this amendment on the country if it is adopted. I hold no brief for the wealthy. Gentlemen, dollars are sensitive and dollars go where they can get returns. There is no doubt but what you can make the rate of taxation so high that men who have money will not risk it in business. They will retire from business. They will put their money in tax-exempt securities, and to-day there is about $20,000,000,000 or $25,000,000,000 of State, county, and municipal bonds that are tax exempt. What effect will this amendment, if it is passed, have on those men who have invested their money in industries, industries that give employment to thousands of your citizens? Suppose those men can not see where, by paying these tax rates, they can make any money. Will they take the chance of doing business and losing money? If they suspend business, will not that add to your unemployment situation?

I simply appeal to you gentlemen to think and then vote just as your conscience dictates, and I accord to each of you the same sincerity of purpose I have.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call the attention of the committee to the parliamentary situation. We have an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Canfield] which brings up the surtaxes to a maximum of 50 per cent on all amounts over $500,000. We have a substitute to that amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing] which brings up the rates where the gentleman from Indiana stops and graduates them up to a maximum of 65 per cent on incomes of over $5,000,000.

Mr. SWING. Net?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Net incomes of $5,000,000. So let us not be unduly exercised over that. The first vote, gentlemen, will be on the substitute. If that is carried, it will be substituted for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and we will then have the maximum rates graduated from the $100,000 40 per cent maximum provided by the committee up to 65 per cent on incomes over $5,000,000 net.

Now, let me say this one word on the merits and in reply to the statements that this will not bring in any revenue. Many of you served with me in 1924 and in 1926 when we had the so-called Mellon plan reducing these very rates in the income-tax section. You remember it, gentlemen. We were told that if we reduced the rate we would never have a deficit, because the revenue from income tax would increase and that there would be that much more money put into commerce. That it would stimulate business and assure continued prosperity. But look what has happened from 1926 to 1932.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Georgia has stated that this will hamper business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that.

Mr. RANKIN. As a matter of fact, all the expenses of running a business are deducted, and has not this tended to cause them to pay their laborers more and to be more liberal with their help?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And much has also been stated about tax-exempt securities. Let us analyze that for just a moment, please. Federal bonds are not tax exempt under the law. Therefore they can not put the money into Federal bonds to escape Federal taxes. State and municipal bonds are taxed by the State and the only reason for issuing bonds by a State or municipality is for public works, and that is what we are looking for them to do right now in order to give employment. The States will derive the benefit of lower rates of interest and higher income taxes—where States have an income tax. [Applause.]

We can not cut from the States every source of revenue, and we thank the opposition for suggesting that this will allow money to go into State and municipal bonds so that they can finance their public works and tax the bonds at the same time.

Gentlemen, this amendment or this schedule has two specific purposes, both of them very important.

One, it is a social tax in keeping with the American policy that we must not permit the concentration of all our national wealth in a few families. [Applause.]

Besides bringing about in an orderly, constitutional manner the necessary distribution of wealth, it is secondly a revenue producer, a substantial increase in revenue. Again, I will take the figures of the Treasury Department, and you will find in the hearings that a conservative estimate of doubling the rates as contained in the bill will bring anywhere from $80,000,000 to $95,000,000 additional taxes if we accept the substitute offered by the gentleman from California. I urge the adoption of the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I have not as yet taken any time in the discussion of this bill, rather preferring to express, briefly, my thoughts as we go along under the 5-minute rule.

I was one of some 50 Republicans in 1924 that joined with the solid Democratic minority in defeating the so-called Mellon tax bill. I am not as agile in my mental processes as many of my Democratic friends and am unable to jump from the things I then believed in and voted for to some of the things that my Democratic friends now ardently advocate and accept and which we then opposed.

As I see it, the argument centers down to this: No one argues against the increased income taxes on their merits but do argue that we dare not levy these increased income taxes because they will not be paid. Have we reached the time when the Congress of the United States must accept the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] when he said that Congress must not go beyond rates where these "patriotic" gentlemen feel they should not go? I am not accepting the idea that we should fix a rate only as high as the millionaire may feel that he ought to pay, but, rather, I accept the doctrine that the man of big wealth ought to pay, in proportion, more than the man of moderate means to the support of the government that has created the opportunity and protected him in the accumulation of that wealth. Congress, not the tax-payer, should determine the rate. Patriotic citizens will accept it.

The greatest menace this country faces is the accumulation of great wealth in the hands of a few individuals. [Applause.] Within the last week we have seen one nation in the world compelled to pass a special act of its parliament at midnight, due to the financial crisis in that nation because one individual saw fit to remove himself from this earth.

If there are ways that they can avoid the payment of the expense of operating this Government, let us find ways to check up those holes rather than supinely admit that we can not compel them to pay. No one has argued here to-day that these taxes should not be levied, but rather that they can not be collected. I believe that they should be levied. I believe they can be collected.

On the matter of income taxes, on the matter of inheritance taxes, and on the matter of estate taxes we have a right to ask those people who have accumulated this wealth and who have these incomes to contribute in increasing proportion to the support of the Government that has made it possible that they obtain those incomes in this Nation and protects their accumulations.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The strongest evidence we have that the amendment will produce the revenue is in the tears that are being shed by the gentleman from Massachusetts and our former colleague, Mr. Ogden Mills, over the proposition. It is worrying those gentlemen.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest this: If there are those in this Nation who will avoid the payment of the rates that are proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing], those individuals will scheme and work out means to avoid the payment of the taxes that the committee proposes. I favor the Swing amendments.

Mr. RAGON. Will my friend from Nebraska yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. I want to suggest that Mr. Ogden Mills had no more to do with the writing of these rates in the bill in any particular than did the gentleman from Nebraska or the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, the gentleman will say that I had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. RAGON. He did not, either. Mr. Mills also asked us to pass a retroactive provision with respect to the taxes which would have been an extremely great burden upon himself if we had adopted it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, under the present rate of surtaxes 6,152 people were willing to pay taxes on incomes above $100,000, earned in 1930, without seeking to escape such taxation by investments in tax-exempt securities. For the year 1929 there were 15,061 persons who paid on incomes in excess of $100,000. In 1929, 1,471 persons paid on incomes over $500,000, but in 1930 only 460 paid on such incomes.

We prepared this bill with the idea of getting the greatest amount of money out of the income taxes we could. To farm acres that will not yield a crop is not good farming, and to levy taxes in such a way that they will not produce revenue is not good legislation.

There are in this country many billions of State, county, and local tax-exempt securities. They have been thrown back on the market in enormous quantities. I know from a nation-wide survey that perfectly sound bonds are selling to earn 5½ and 6 per cent that ought to be sold on a 4½ basis.

Members refer to the present depression as a war-time depression. But it is not comparable with the former war period. In the former war period business made tremendous profits. It was profitable then to invest money in business, and the returns justified the expenditure. With constantly increasing profits taxpayers were willing to pay the high rates of taxation without seeking exemptions by investments in tax-exempt securities. There was a continually ascending trend in business. But now business has suffered a serious decline and profits are small, generally. The incentive of large profits from business is not present as it was during the period of the World War. Credit has diminished. At this time there is an attractive opportunity to make a better earning from the safer source of investments in tax-exempt securities, not only in State and municipal, but in United States securities, including Treasury bills, certificates, and notes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is out of our control.

Mr. HAWLEY. But we were compelled to act under conditions as they are. We made the rates for the purpose of obtaining the maximum of revenue. A tax is not profitable merely because it is high in rate.

If we had concluded that an opportunity existed for us to obtain a larger amount, we would have increased the tax; but we believe we have reached the point of diminishing returns. To increase the tax as is now proposed by the pending amendments will diminish the amount of revenue that the bill is designed to secure. Instead of helping, so far as the manufacturers' excise tax is concerned, the pending amendments will make it necessary to raise more money from such sources than that proposed in the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the substitute amendment close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the work that the Ways and Means Committee has done. I do not want to take away any credit that they deserve for the long days and nights they labored before bringing out this measure.

I rise to favor the substitute amendment by the gentleman from California.

I read the remarks of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Huddleston], in which he spoke about the demagogues, which may be true in some respects, but I do not think I am a demagogue to-day in standing on the floor of the House and saying that the time has come, in my opinion, in the affairs of this country when we are not going to ask the men with big swollen fortunes in this country whether they are willing to pay an income tax, as the gentleman from Oregon stated, but tell them that they are going to pay. The gentleman from Oregon used the word "willing."

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman will yield, what I intended to say was, they paid under the rates in force for 1930 without seeking to escape taxation by investments in tax-exempt securities. We are willing to make them pay all reasonable amounts, but under the financial conditions and the legislation of the country, there is an opportunity for them to evade.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman from Nebraska spoke the truth when he said that the greatest evil in this country to-day is the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few. [Applause.] The great economists of the country have repeatedly stressed this fact until we know it as a truism.

The only way that you can take a proper percentage of that wealth away from a few and distribute it to the general public, the American people, where it rightfully belongs, is through amendments of this sort. If you say they will put it in tax-exempt securities, let us try them out. Since the Mellon plan went into effect, they have come in here every year and said, "Let us reduce taxes once more, because it will bring prosperity." Instead of prosperity, we find 8,000,-000 men out of work. Now let us try the other proposition and take 65 per cent away from them on net incomes of five millions and over, and if we find then that they put their money in tax-exempt securities, which, in some cases, is not a bad thing, as the gentleman from New York says, because it gives the States an opportunity to put through their public-work projects, and we find that to dodge taxes they buy too heavily in tax-exempt securities for the common good, then let us come in here and put through an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that will take the tax exemption away from these State and municipal securities. I think one of the most important things that we will face in this Congress is this legislation we are considering right now on this proposition of surtaxes. I feel the next move we should make is to put a good stiff tax on inheritances, and then finally wipe out the manufacturers' excise tax, and we will have done something that really represents the will of the great rank and file of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. If the Swing amendment is voted down, will it then be proper for me to offer my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. It will. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Crisp) there were—ayes 153, noes 87.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as amended by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

(d) Evasion of surtaxes by incorporation: For tax on corporations which accumulate surplus to evade surtax on stockholders, see section 104.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], while we are on this section, which simply refers to section 104, just what is meant. Section 104 covers only such corporations as holding companies, where no dividends are distributed for the purpose of evading income taxes. Has the committee considered a tax on undivided profits in corporations where profits are not divided but permitted to build up in order to avoid taxes? I point out that while the provisions of section 104 referred to in this paragraph cover fully what the gentleman has in mind, these particular holding companies, does it cover an existing evil of avoiding taxes by placing profits in surplus? I know that many corporations instead of dividing their profits in dividends after building up a reasonable surplus, keep piling up a surplus to avoid taxes, and then use this money for call money or even gamble in the stock market.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the section, it applies to all corporations that hold moneys and surplus for purposes of evading taxation.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Would it apply to a commercial corporation that is not dividing its profits for the purpose of tax evasion and is building up a surplus?

Mr. CRISP. It is intended to apply to all corporations, holding companies, and others that are holding surpluses for the purpose of evading taxation.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Suppose it is not a holding corporation; suppose it is an operating corporation.

Mr. CRISP. If it is any corporation, whether an operating corporation or a holding corporation, that holds its surplus to evade taxes, it is my understanding that that comes within the provisions of the law, and the chief of the legislative drafting bureau advises me that that is what it does.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Then may I suggest for the consideration of the committee, that when we reach section 104, which is highly technical, where you provide the nondeclaration of dividends as prima facie evidence, I shall move to strike out "prima facie evidence" and insert "conclusive evidence" under the same state of facts as now contained in section 104.

Mr. CRISP. The committee will consider any amendment that the gentleman offers.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. My question pertains to the matter which apparently the gentleman from New York [Mr. La-GUARDIA] has in mind, and that is the type or degree of proof as a practical proposition that will have to be resorted to by the Treasury Department before it can levy a tax upon undistributed profits. That is, what proof will be needed to establish the fact that the profits are not distributed in order to evade payment of surtaxes?

Mr. CRISP. I can only say to the gentleman that, of course, no law goes into all details and specifies the proof, and so forth. That is something that would have to be passed on by the Treasury Department.

Mr. BURTNESS. It is always a difficult matter to ascertain; I am anxious for a fairly definite legislative guide.

Mr. CRISP. We can not specify in the bill the kind of affidavits that will be required or the evidence that the Treasury Department must have. Some human agency must be charged with the responsibility of administering the law and they will have to pass on that proposition.

Mr. BURTNESS. It is always a difficult question to determine the intent.

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that is what I said on an assumed state of facts as indicated in the bill, that it should be conclusive evidence and not prima facie evidence. We have had considerable trouble with this provision during the last few years where we have refunded hundreds of millions of dollars collected in 1918 and 1919. Unless we make this clear so as to protect the Treasury and not protect certain lawyers so helpful to the committee at times, we ought to write the words in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do this for one purpose. I asked the Secretary of the Treasury one time what undistributed profits he had ever ruled upon to show that the corporation was violating this statute, which is practically the same one we have had, section 220, although we amended it. He gave me no information at that time. That was in his office. I challenge any member of the committee, and there may be some who can give the answer, to name one corporation that has ever been assessed under that statute, that requires a tax upon undistributed profits. It had never been done in history to that time as far as I can ascertain. We have endeavored to make that effective and it ought to be done.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. FREAR. Gladly.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Parker, who is chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, advises me that there is a letter in these hearings showing where, about a year ago, there were $6,000,000 in taxes collected under this section.

Mr. FREAR. The practice has been heretofore, Mr. Chairman, to give stock dividends. Of course, we all know that that was done in order to defeat this very tax. It was before that time that I asked the Secretary of the Treasury in his office, and individually I received no reply whatsoever. That was prior to 1927. I now understand that recently some effort has been made to act under the statute.

Mr. CRISP. I may say that Mr. Parker's chief duty is to review all these matters in the Treasury Department where there have been refunds, and so forth, and he is about as familiar with the returns in the Treasury Department as any of the employees and has as full knowledge as anybody. He says that within the last year $6,000,000 has been collected under this provision of the law.

Mr. FREAR. It ought to have been many times that amount during past years. The Gulf Oil Co. was the one who started the stock dividends and split-ups according to Lamp, an oil publication I then mentioned. I made that statement to the Secretary in his office.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is that an American company?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman knows who is the head of it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. But I want to know.

Mr. FREAR. It is an American company. The headquarters are supposed to be at Pittsburgh.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Oh, that is the Mellon Co.?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman has guessed it. [Laughter.] The Clerk read as follows:

(a) Rate of tax: There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax of 13 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 26.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Fuller: On page 15, line 11, add the following paragraph:

"(b) In addition to the tax provided and set forth in paragraph (a) of the section there shall be levied and collected for each taxable year from and paid by every corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the United States, whether paying any tax under paragraph (a) thereof or not, a tax of $1 upon each $1,000 of its capital stock."

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I realize it is a hard matter to write a revenue bill in the Committee of the Whole House. No doubt many things we are doing now and many things that will be done before we get through will go to the Senate and be thrashed out there and in conference, but if our country is in the condition which it is claimed we ought to let the people know and we ought to let the other body know what we are in favor of.

The amendment which I have introduced is the old wartime measure. It will bring in $100,000,000 a year. It is not a radical measure. I have always been classed as a conservative. In most of the congressional districts of the United States the capitalization of corporations is $25,000. $50,000, and up to $200,000. They can well afford to pay this tax if we are in such a condition. If we are so bankrupt in the United States as the leader on this side of the House told us yesterday, that we will go into bankruptcy and will see the greatest panic that ever happened in the world's history if we attempt to sell $600,000,000 more of bonds, then we ought to conscript wealth, as we do the flesh, blood, and brains of our citizens in war times, in order to see that this country shall not go upon the rocks of destruction. [Applause.]

This is not a radical measure. We can take this measure and two or three others that we seek to put into this bill. and that we will put into this bill, and eliminate the infamous sales tax that is sought to be imposed upon the laboring class and the poor class of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism of the Ways and Means Committee. It is composed of much of the intellect and brains and statesmanship of this House. They have striven as best they could to bring in a measure, but on the Democratic side, where we find ourselves to be without leadership in an official capacity, the committee in reference to the sales tax is representing less than 25 per cent of the Democrats in the House of Representatives. If this tax measure is passed, it will be passed by the Republicans of this House, who ought to bear the blame for it.

We are willing to cooperate. We are willing to balance the Budget, but we are not willing to balance the Budget by going out and conscripting the small incomes of the poor people of this country. If anybody is conscripted, it should be those who are in a position to carry the burden.

Take a corporation that has $100,000 of capital stock. What does it care about paying $100 in order to try to avoid this great catastrophe and this great panic that is upon us now?

This is one of the measures we seek to have the committee adopt to take the place of the infamous sales tax. This is a measure that has been advocated by two or three members of the Ways and Means Committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] said, and other experts say, that this measure will bring in $100,000,000. Of course, some may think it is too radical, but it is not. It is very conservative, in view of the fact that we are told by our leaders we are about to go on the rocks and unless we balance our Budget we are going to be bankrupt. Of course, everybody knows this is not so. Everybody knows this Nation is not going on the rocks. Everybody knows that the selling of $600,000,000 worth of bonds is not going to hurt the credit of this country.

I ask you to seriously consider the adoption of the amendment I have offered. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP and Mr. HADLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the chairman of the committee, Mr. CRISP.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not believe this amendment would have been germane to this provision of the bill but I did not care to interpose a point of order. I think I understand the temper of the committee, but charged with a duty and a responsibility I shall measure up to that to the best of my ability. [Applause.] I am performing a duty, as I see it, for my country. I am not criticizing others who differ with me. Each man is the keeper of his own conscience, and I will always maintain my integrity and my self-respect. I desire simply to call your attention to these facts in connection with this amendment: The corporation tax under the old law was 12 per cent. The committee has recommended increasing that to 13 per cent. Under the old law any corporation that had a net income of less than $25,000 was given an exemption of $3,000. The committee changed that. The committee under this bill provides that a corporation having a net income above $10,000 is not given any exemption at all, but corporations with an income of less than $10,000 will get an exemption of $2,000 instead of $3,000.

The report from the Treasury Department shows that last year 52 per cent of the corporations doing business in the United States paid no corporation income tax for they had no net income and paid no tax.

You know, gentleman, as well as I do, that if a stockholder receives any income distributed by a corporation and if that stockholder had a sufficient income to bring him within the surtax class he pays on the income he gets from the corporation, and the corporation, of course, has paid the corporate tax, provided there was a net income.

That is all I desire to say to you. I simply present the facts to you.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. There are a great many of us who are only accepting the policy of a sales tax on the supposition that there is no other way out. My opposition to this amendment is based upon the proposition that it contains the very evil of the sales tax and that is that it is a levy on corporations doing business, without regard to whether they are making any money or not, or whether they are conducting a profitable business or not.

We all know there are a great many corporations in this country trying to hang on; they are trying to carry on; they are trying to keep their pay rolls going, and yet we impose a capital stock tax. That may have been all right during the time of the war when these corporations were operating on cost and 10 per cent plus. It was all right when everybody was making money, but this tax has every evil that a sales tax has. It falls upon those who are unable to bear it. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that any man who will oppose a sales tax certainly ought to oppose this tax.

There is another provision in this bill that seems to me most unfair, and that is the provision which imposes a sales tax on foreign corporations based upon their capitalization. In other words, the United States is imposing upon a Canadian corporation a capital stock tax on the capitalization that is in Canada. In all probability only one-tenth or one one-hundredth of its business is in the United States. Suppose every other country should impose a similar tax on international corporations? They would be taxed out of pocket before they could start any business.

This is a most inequitable and unfair amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee discussed this matter from the standpoint I had in mind when I arose before. The gentleman who has just left the floor also raised several questions in connection with the amendment which the committee had in mind when it was considering matters it did not report, and this was one of them. This matter had the thorough consideration of the committee, at least of the subcommittee, and it did not see its way clear to consider it, for the very obvious reasons which have been referred to by those who have spoken in opposition to it.

I did not quite understand the reading of the amendment. I did not get it all, but if I did understand the text correctly it is a direct tax. I do not understand that this amendment is predicated upon the privilege of doing business. The stock tax in the prior law, to which reference has been made, was based upon that privilege and upon that basis it came within the limitations of the Constitution. But if this is a tax merely upon capitalization, directly upon the stock itself, then it does not have any legal standing within the terms of the Constitution. If that is the text of the amendment, I feel certain my contention is correct. However, that can be determined upon a subsequent reading of the amendment.

Unless I am ill-advised as to the text of the amendment, I believe it is unconstitutional because it is a direct tax and, of course, I need not discuss that. The question is, Is it a direct tax? I think it is, if I heard it read correctly.

In the second place, the proposal challenges the principle of ability to pay. It denies the principle of the income tax itself, which is based upon that ability to pay.

Reference has been made to the fact that a large number of corporations in the country at the present time are almost wholly in the red. The dividends of the corporations that are not in the red represent the net result to the stockholders and many stockholders of the country are impecunious, and are looking to these dividends for support, and you are simply loading the overhead and diminishing the returns to the stockholders at a time like this. Furthermore the result will be, in my opinion, it will not produce the tax which the gentleman, in supporting the amendment, stated it will produce. It will not be productive of revenue even if it has any standing in law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose any or all of the 52 per cent of the corporations that have no income, as shown by the returns, fail to pay this excise tax of $1 based on every $1,000 of capital stock, what is going to become of the corporation and what is going to become of the tax? How are they going to collect the tax?

Mr. HADLEY. There is no way to pay it.

Mr. STAFFORD. They can sell the franchise if the tax is constitutional, but the gentleman says it is unconstitutional and I agree with the gentleman. I think it is one of these ill-advised proposals to raise money.

Mr. HADLEY. There is one other point I wish to make in this brief time and that is this: The capital-stock tax, as we had it during the war, was one of the worst taxes we ever had in our taxation system. It was not possible of successful administration. If this tax were based on the privilege of doing business and had a legal standing, then you would have to administer it and at great expense. If it is the kind of tax we had during the war and if you have to take into account the value of the stock, then there will have to be a survey made all over the country with respect to the value of the stocks of corporations, and with respect to this tax during the war these surveys lasted for years and tied up the taxes of corporations indefinitely, and it was the judgment of everybody that it was a bad tax and one that ought to be repealed.

I hope the amendment will not be written into the law under any theory.

[Here the gavel fell.]

last word.

Mr. Chairman, although I come from a farm State and although I am hopeful that it may be found possible to locate enough money so that Congress does not have to enact a manufacturers' tax, as to which I will not personally reach a final conclusion until we see where we are at as to amendments and further exemptions, I do want to warn those who are looking for other funds not to adopt a policy so unsound in principle, so absolutely unfair and burdensome, not only to business but also to the consumers of the country, as this proposed tax on capital stock proposed by the pending amendment would be.

So much has already been said about it that I think there is not much occasion for saying much more against it, but let me try to give you practical illustrations of how it would

As has already been indicated this proposal does not involve the ability of a corporation to pay. It is a tax against the corporation that is in the red as well as against the one which has a profit. It assesses the tax in accordance with the capital stock, and it taxes that capital in accordance with its par value, regardless of whether the capital of the corporation is impaired or whether the corporation has a surplus amounting to several times the amount of the par value of the capital—a proposition positively ridiculous to anyone who desires to obtain taxes from those best able to pay them.

But let us get down to a practical analysis. Any corporation starting in a new year's business at the beginning thereof, if it knows it has to pay a capital stock tax regardless of net profits, regardless of whether it will have an income, large or small, what happens? The management writes the amount of that capital stock tax into its budget for overhead expense together with its rent, with its heat, with its light, with its labor, with its real estate and personal-property tax, adds them all together, and then figures out the gross profit it deems necessary, for instance, on goods or commodities which it is going to sell to the public to pay all overhead expense, plus a hoped-for profit, and any person who knows anything about business transactions knows they are, at least, going to add that tax to the cost; if they do not pyramid it with intent and purpose, they are at least going to arrive at a percentage of profit at a high enough figure which in their judgment will amply collect the tax from the consumers. Now, this is about all there is to it, as to who will pay it if approved.

So I say to those of you who are trying to avoid a sales tax or a manufacturers' tax, listen to the argument that was presented by the gentleman from Ohio here a few minutes ago who told you that every argument against the sales tax applies to this proposed amendment. I would go farther and say that it applies with more force, for it is one that will of necessity always be passed on and probably will be pyramided and will fall upon the backs of the consumers of the country. A small sales tax may or may not be passed on, depending upon competition and other pertinent factors.

So let us not, by reason of any prejudice that may exist in our minds with reference to corporations, fall into the folly of supporting the amendment.

Then remember, too, particularly those of you who come from States where a lot of relatively small corporations are in competition with partnerships in similar lines of business, where you find a corporation on one side of the street and a partnership over on the other side of the street engaged in a competitive business-all those corporations with an income of $10,000 will, under the law, pay a 13 per cent tax, without this addition.

Why add to that burden when their competitor, doing business as an individual or as a partnership, pays a maximum normal tax of 7 per cent on his income. Of course, there might be some variation depending upon whether the individuals get into the surtax figures or not, but the corporation's stockholders also pay surtaxes on corporation dividends. So, in fairness between competing firms and

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the | individuals on the one hand and corporations on the other hand, this amendment should be defeated.

An item of less consequence is the fact that an additional report would have to be filed and add to the annoyance of every small corporation. Many such overlooked these reports during the war, and tremendous trouble and much expense ensued. Let the tax to be collected from corporations be included in one report and be in accordance with net profits, consistent with ability to pay.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out "$1" and insert "50 cents."

SEVERAL MEMBERS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 9, strike out the figures "13" and insert the figures "15."

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment just read is submitted for the reason that I believe it contains all of the strength that the prior amendment contained weakness, and at the same time will produce substantial revenue.

In the first place, the tax is not to be paid by any corporation that is not making a profit. It has been estimated that the amendment if adopted will increase our revenue by approximately $34,000,000.

Now, that is not a sufficient amount to be designated as confiscation of wealth. It is a fair tax, considering the condition and the time, placed upon a corporation that is making a profit. Such a tax can not be easily passed on to the consumer, as a sales tax would be, because these corporations that are making a profit will be in competition with other corporations which are not making a profit, and therefore do not have to pay the tax. Therefore, the price of the commodities of the tax-paying corporation will be in competition with commodities of those companies which do not pay the tax, and it will be more difficult to pass this tax on to the

Then, with reference to such a tax, the corporation will know at the beginning of the year that it will have to pay the tax in the event a profit exists at the end of the year. and it will be a very great stimulant to increase the pay roll to distribute the money among their own neighborhood and bring prosperity into its wake, instead of depression, as many other forms of taxation would undoubtedly do.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to disagree with my friend from Ohio, but the subcommittee had under consideration this item at 15 per cent, 14 and 13, down to the present law. It looked into all the conditions existing in the country and weighed the conditions of corporations all over the country, and we felt that the present rate was about all that the traffic would bear.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in this instance I am in full agreement with the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Georgia. [Applause. We generally are in agreement, except little matters once in a while. [Laughter.]

This amendment ought not to be adopted for this reason. We know that if there should be high dividends by any corporation we get them on the surtax in the individual returns. I think that is a complete answer to the proposed amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When we had the last tax bill before the House we secured an exemption of $3,500 on corporations, which was very helpful to the smaller ones. I would like to remind gentlemen that, while corporations were generally formed to avoid personal liability, nowadays business generally is largely in corporate form, even the usual business in the rural and small communities.

This high rate is simply a step toward dissolving these small corporations, where there is now a division of ownership and wherein numbers of our citizens may become small owners in various businesses, and forcing a return to the old plan of partnership and individual ownership. They can then take advantage of the much lower rates and exemptions granted to individuals. I hardly think that we should continue to raise rates to such unreasonable amounts as to make it nothing else but legalized stealing. We place ourselves in the attitude of setting the example to our citizens in our municipalities to tax only the wealthy, efficient persons residing therein by framing some form of legalized confiscation of their property, under the theory that they are the only ones able to pay. But we predict that we may not be successful in the results of this legalized thievery of incomes, because we are to have such attractive tax-exempt investments that what wealth may be left will buy these instead of making further attempts in industry. As to the tax on corporations, it is only a short time ago when we recognized that they were already overtaxed and even granted an exemption. Let us encourage division of ownership by the corporate method in our communities, so that many can share in a business, and not discourage it by any such amendment as this. I can not imagine that the amendment will have any standing, but I could not help repeating some of the things said on this floor in 1928, relating to the relief of small corporations.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I rise for the purpose of answering the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gifford], who condemns our demand that those who have grown rich at the expense of the Americans shall pay their just proportion of taxes and characterizes it as "legalized stealing." The gentleman from Massachusetts has been a Member of the House for many years. He voted for the tariff. He was willing to levy a tariff or tax on the great mass of the American people and take from them, without any remuneration to them, millions and hundreds of millions and even billions of dollars to enrich the favored few. He voted for the tariff that has bled the country white and brought about the deplorable condition that we find ourselves in to-day, pouring that wealth into the pockets of those who profited at the expense of the American people and at the expense of human misery. Was it stealing then; was it legalized stealing when you passed the discriminatory laws to help the favored few strip the toiling masses of America until to-day they are forced into the bread line?

I wonder how the gentleman from Massachusetts reconciles his conscience by voting for that legalized highway robbery when he comes in here to-day and denounces those of us who are attempting to tax those who have grown rich as a result of legislation for which he voted. He denounces us who want to tax those people in order to help save this Government.

He is willing to tax the poor individual on everything that he buys, through this infamous sales tax; he is willing to tax the little corporation in his district and in my district and in yours, small enterprises that are struggling along, trying to make a living, paying out practically all they make to labor in order to keep the community going; he is willing to destroy them by levying a 2½ per cent tax on their product, when he knows it will drive many of them out of business. That, of course, is not legalized stealing.

Mr. LUCE rose.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, I knew that if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gifford] had a sympathizer it would be his colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman referred to the objectionable features of the tariff. Does the gentleman intend to vote for a tariff on oil?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I do not.

Mr. LUCE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is very welcome, "and then some." If I know it, I am not going to vote for any other legislative iniquity that I think is a discrimination against any portion of the American people, or to give anybody a special privilege to rob somebody else. Unlike the gentleman from Massachusetts, I am not willing to help rob the people in one way and then come up and denounce Congress for "legalized robbery" when we seek to tax them equally or increase their income and inheritance taxes in order to keep from putting on a sales tax that would bring irreparable injury to our people.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in order to answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) Improper accumulation of surplus: For tax on corporations which accumulate surplus to evade surtax on stockholders, see section 104.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McFadden: Page 15, line 14, strike out all of subsection (c) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There shall be levied, collected, and paid each taxable year upon the surpluses of corporations a tax of 2 per cent per annum."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I took occasion to refer to this particular source of revenue as a logical means to be available for distributing the burdens of taxation. This amendment, if adopted, will produce over $1,000,-000,000 in revenue to the United States. I point out again that the combined net surpluses of corporations is shown to be $55,111,294,125, in relation to total assets of $335,777,-909,511. The total capital stock is $109,857,923,000. In analyzing this statement it will be found that $55,000,000,000 to-day is the amount of surpluses. Of this, $22,371,000,000 is represented in cash and $10,000,000,000 is represented in tax-exempt securities. In other words, there is available for the purposes of collecting this tax surplus assets of the corporations in the United States (according to the last statement, which appears on page 25 of the bulletin compiled under the title "Statistics of Income" by the Treasury Department) to the extent of $32,709,000,000 in cash and taxexempt securities out of the total surplus of $55,000,000,000.

I know of no better source to which we can look for revenue than this. It certainly will not injure those corporations to pay a small tax of 2 per cent on the surplus. These are profits which were accumulated from the sale of their stocks, at a premium in many instances, to the investing public and from earnings during their prosperous years. It is a proper source for consideration, and I submit the amendment should be adopted.

Yesterday in my remarks I mentioned a levy of 4 per cent, but I think 2 per cent would be more proper for consideration in connection with this bill. This will supply sufficient revenues so that we will not be compelled to resort to this terrible plan of sales tax and the other nuisance taxes which are embodied in this bill.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman's amendment provide for 2 per cent on the amount that is carried to surplus each year, or is it 2 per cent on the accumulated surplus from year to year?

Mr. McFADDEN. It is 2 per cent on the total accumulated surplus at the present time. By way of explanation let me call your attention to a couple of financial statements which will illustrate just what I am striving to make clear. Note the statement of Allied Chemical Co. taken from the New York Times, March 18, 1932, page 36, as follows:

ALLIED CHEMICAL & DYE CORPORATION [Year ending December 31, 1931]

The net income for 1931 was $18,931,511 after depreciation, obsolescence, taxes, and renewals equivalent to $6.74 a share on the 2,401,288 common shares outstanding at the end of the year.

In 1930 the net was $25,103,539, equivalent to $9.75 a share on the 2,286,980 shares then outstanding. The company has trans-ferred $40,000,000 from surplus to contingency reserve account to protect its operations and assets against future contingencies.

The balance sheet shows current assets of $152,407,823 against current liabilities of $6,994,541, a ratio of 21.8 to 1, leaving net working capital of $145,413,282. The preceding annual balance sheet put total current assets at $155,407,336, contrasted with current liabilities of $8,715,056, a ratio of 17.8 to 1, leaving net working capital of $146,736,280.

The property account was increased last year from $219,136,151 to $223,068,894, indicating $3,932,734 expansion. The reserve for obsolescence and depreciation was increased from $117,158,291 to $122,746,940, or from 53.5 per cent to 55 per cent of the property account.

Total assets increased $5,815,274 to $408,049,802, with inventories carried at the lower of cost or market. Investments are carried at a cost of $10,413,770. Surplus, including $61,752,335 capital surplus, stood at $165,169,252 at the end of the year.

You will note that their total surplus, including $61,752,335 capital surplus, was $165,169,252 at the end of 1931, or an extra surplus over and above the capital surplus $103,416,917.

The multiplication of the many similar surpluses of hundreds of corporations which are in excess of capital requirements of the companies which go to make up the big funds running into billions, which funds are used by the officers of these big corporations in stock-market operations. This is the source of the funds that were designated by the Federal reserve bankers as bootleg money when it was invested in the stock market and in brokers' loans in 1928-29. This was independent money, not under the control of the Federal reserve, and the investment of which impeded the management of the Federal reserve to deal with the orgy of speculation in 1928 and 1929.

I also call your attention to the following statement:

WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC & MANUFACTURING CO. ANNUAL REPORT FOR YEAR ENDING DECEMBER 31, 1931—SURPLUS, $79,050,324; CURRENT

Plant, less reserves, totaled $73,539,936 at the end of 1931 against $72,272,128 the year before. Total investments were $47,245,326, against $57,682,403.

Current assets amounted to $100,522,487, including $20,585,564 cash, $1,828,584 United States Government securities at market, and $9,734,580 other marketable securities at market against $115,104,125 at the close of 1930, including $24,081,334 cash, $3,450,275 United States Government securities, and $5,091,125 other marketable securities, all at market. Notes and accounts receivable, less reserves, were $28,754,283 against $37,206,125, and inventories, at cost or less, were $39,619,472 against $45,237,405.

Current liabilities were $7,368,011, against $15,186,859 the year

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, this tax would be unconstitutional. In my opinion, it violates the Constitution, levying a direct tax. But let us forget temporarily, as we frequently do, the Constitution of the United States and discuss this matter on its merits. Is it not essential for a corporation to accumulate some surplus in good years to be able to operate in the lean years? I think good business requires that a corporation build up a surplus to meet emergencies. I repeat again, this amendment proposes to levy a direct tax of 2 per cent on the accumulated surpluses of corporations. It is a direct tax. It singles out those corporations, and I believe it will be obnoxious to the Constitution.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, without necessarily going into the merits of the proposition, I believe we should not permit the challenge to the constitutionality of the proposal to go unanswered. It seems to me it would be very difficult to argue that the profits of a corporation are properly taxable if declared and divided; but if those same profits are held by a corporation in avoidance of taxes, they may not be taxed. I can not follow the gentleman on that.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I was discussing the amendment as proposed, which levied a 2 per cent tax on accumulated surpluses of corporations.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. True. The surpluses we are discussing and which are the subject of a proposed tax come from one source only, and that is from profits. That is the only character of a surplus I am referring to, and when so created to avoid taxes. Some gentlemen are confusing reserve with surplus.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Is it not frequently the fact that in the creation of a corporation there is paid in a surplus that is not earned surplus at all?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly; and that is reserve.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. It is a surplus just the same, is it not?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden] offered is to levy a tax on surplus created by profits, for the purpose of evading taxation.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Is that language in the amendment? Mr. LaGUARDIA. If the gentleman will refer to section 104 of this bill, it is provided:

If any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its shareholders through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxyear upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 50 per cent of the amount therof.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LaGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. I call attention to the fact that section 104 of this bill was covered in the previous statute by section 220, which is intended to prevent the accumulation of surplus to evade surtaxes. At the present time and for the past 10 years it has merely appeared as an ornament, and in August, 1930, the United States Board of Tax Appeals handed down its first decision under this section, which was United Business Corporation of America (19 B. T. A. 109). Up to the present time the Treasury Department has absolutely failed to apply this section, and the Treasury, as a result thereof, has been losing millions of dollars in taxes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to point out that in my reference to the surplus within the meaning of section 104 and what I believe to be contemplated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania it is surplus built up exclusively from profits for the purpose of avoiding taxes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I fully understood the purpose of the gentleman from New York; but after listening to the reading of the amendment and grasping it as best I could from a single reading, I did not think the amendment was at all in accord with the position stated by the gentleman from New York, but that its purpose is to take all surplus, no matter when or how or under what circumstances accumulated. It would be a direct tax upon surplus, that is in direct violation and contravention of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I do not believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden] has any such drastic application in mind.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. May we have the amendment again read for the information of the committee?

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Well, I have the floor. I yield to one Member at a time. I yield to the gentleman from Penn-

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I have sufficiently identified this fund in the Treasury statement. I have referred to the fact that it covered the situation that was intended to be covered in section 220 of the previous revenue act, which has not been enforced.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Reserving the right to object, I will not object, provided we have the amendment again reported to the House for the information of the House, so that we may have a better understanding of just what it contemplates.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That is satisfactory to me. The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. McFADDEN.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. I do not think the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois is sound. A surplus within the meaning of the tax law refers to earnings for the current year and not an artificial surplus created by the organizers of a corporation at the time it is created, as is sometimes done, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois. It refers to earnings for the current year. Earnings may be distributed to stockholders in the form of dividends or they may be undistributed and become a part of the surplus. Obviously the purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to reach the undistributed earnings or profits of a corporation, and therefore, it is not subject to the constitutional inhibition, referred to by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It had not been my purpose, gentlemen, to take any part in this discussion for the reason that I felt that the views of the gentlemen who have made a careful study of this subject through many weeks in the Ways and Means Committee ought to be a fairly safe guide upon the main propositions to the membership of this House.

I have never felt that the illy considered and hastily formed views of men who have not had the advantage of the hearings ought to influence very greatly the course of as important a piece of legislation as this.

When it comes to the proposition of taxing surpluses that may be accumulated through a number of years, that may be reserved as a surplus from paid-in capital and not as the result of earnings, I think most certainly we should stop and consider before we act. In my opinion, the proposed amendment would be in direct conflict with and contravention of the Constitution of the United States upon the subject of direct taxation, as set forth in section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] contemplates that the amendment as offered refers to earned surpluses. I understand his proposition thoroughly, but the amendment does not so state. Indeed, Mr. McFadden states that the surpluses of corporations is $55,000,000,000, and if taxed at the rate of 2 per cent would produce a tax of $1,000,000,000. It is plainly his purpose to tax all surpluses of corporations, no matter how obtained or accumulated. To adopt the amendment in question would be to tax a surplus that has accumulated over a course of years and that has been maintained as a surplus without reference to whether it is actually earned or not.

Now, gentlemen, I just want to suggest this, and it probably is the voice of one crying in the wilderness. We had better proceed on some of these matters with much deliberation and great caution. I regret more than I can tell that I have heard language to-day on the floor of this House about the conscription of wealth. You can only put the labor of this country back to work through the employment of the capital and wealth of America and these United States. [Applause.] You can not force this wealth to be so employed by any system that you may be able to devise. Whenever you tax it to the point where you confiscate the source of the means by which the people of the United States may again be put into useful employment, you strike a most serious blow at the Nation and to both capital and labor. It is an unfortunate thing that it goes out to the country that on the floor of this House we talk of the confiscation of wealth. It can not fail but be a shock to the calm sense of the country. Men will listen to these words with amazement. I am not pleading for wealth. My interests do not lead along that line, nor does my path go in that direction; but I am saying to you, gentlemen, that it has been to the glory of our country that we have treated wealth and labor, in theory and in practice, with justice and a fairness that has not done violence to either.

I know that in this the heyday of the demagogue it is easy to make an appeal to the masses and against what many are pleased to call the classes, but I am telling you, gentlemen, that when we do that in this House at this critical time it is to our discredit and we are fiddling while Rome burns. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment. Preceding the word "surpluses," I offer an amendment to add the word "earned."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Blanton to the amendment offered by Mr. McFadden: Preceding the the word "surpluses" in the McFadden amendment, insert the word "earned," so that as McFadden amendment, insert the word "earned," so that as amended the amendment will read: "Page 15, line 14, strike out all of paragraph (c) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

There shall be levied, collected, and paid in each taxable year upon the earned surpluses of corporations a tax of 2 per cent per annum."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, practically all of the objection that was raised to the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFad-DEN]—and he is still distinguished, in my mind—was that it should be only against the earned surplus of a corporation. My amendment would correct those criticisms.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the composition of surpluses.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman do that in his time? Mr. McFADDEN. This is right to the point. Surpluses are from earnings and from the sale of capital stock.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman explain just what he understands this amendment will mean? Does it mean a tax upon all surpluses that have been earned in the past or does it mean only those to be earned in the future? Just what does the amendment mean? Does it mean accumulated surplus or surplus as it may accumulate?

Mr. BLANTON. I will explain to the gentleman. No surplus that is to be earned in the future is a surplus; it can not be a surplus until it is earned, and certainly a surplus that has been set aside by various and numerous corporations to evade the payment of an income tax is a part of the profits of the concern. We know that. There is no escaping that fact. It is a part of the profits which, if distributed, would pay an income tax but does not pay an income tax because, forsooth, it is set aside as a surplus. That is very plain. We all understand it, and I am not in favor of these corporations evading the payment of an income tax by setting apart some amount of their annual earnings or annual profits, if you please, in order to evade that tax.

Many corporations have gotten into the habit of refusing to distribute their annual profits, but have been setting aside each year a large proportion of such annual profits as surplus just to evade the payment of income taxes. If these annual profits were distributed to the stockholders in dividends an income tax would be paid. They escape and evade paying the income tax by not distributing same but by setting same by as surplus.

And then, when years have passed, they will liquidate and distribute this surplus with other capital stock, and the Government will receive nothing whatever from this surplus accumulated over a series of years from annual profits. They also practice another scheme to set aside a large amount as a surplus each year, and then after a while they issue additional stock certificates for it. And all tax to the Government is evaded.

Mr. FREE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from California. Mr. FREE. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that under the wording of the amendment this would be a pyramiding tax; in other words, a surplus that is accumulated would be taxed year after year, so that you would tax the same surplus this year, the next year, and so on?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because after that surplus once pays its tax it is done

Now, I want to say that even if the gentleman's position were correct, it would prevent corporations from evading taxes by taking a large slice of their annual profits and setting that aside as a surplus. They would not hereafter put aside more than sufficient to act as an operating surplus. which, of course, they should have.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. I want to find out the purport of the amendment. As I understood the gentleman, what he seeks to do is to put a tax upon that part of the income that a corporation would annually put into surplus.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; out of its annual profits. That amount which, instead of distributing and letting it bear its part of the income tax, it puts aside as surplus to avoid that.

Mr. RAGON. Does not that mean, then, that you impose upon that part of it a 15 per cent corporation tax?

Mr. BLANTON. All I want to do is to make them pay on annual profits. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden], as amended by my proposal, does not make the corporation pay, I hope there is some man here who is smart enough to draft an amendment that will make the corporation pay. Is not this a reasonable proposition? Why should they have the right to set apart a large part of their annual profits as surplus and escape taxation on it? If they can set aside 15 per cent as surplus or 25 per cent or 60 per cent, why could they not set apart all of their annual profits each year as surplus and escape all taxation? And many are doing that now. I am not willing to let them continue doing it and escape all taxation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment did simply what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] thinks it does, I believe I would be favorable to it, but, of course, it does much more.

The same objection that applies to many of the proposals to add directly to the cost of doing business applies to this amendment, for the amount collected would, in turn, be reflected in the cost of the commodities purchased by the people. It would not be borne by the corporation.

But let us see what it does and whether it is fair. If I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Mc-FADDEN] correctly, it applies a tax of 2 per cent-not upon the earnings of the particular year that any sum is put into the surplus, but it applies that tax upon the accumulated surplus each and every year from now until this law shall be repealed. It is not just one tax of 2 per cent but a tax in that amount each year upon the same money invested as reserve or surplus capital.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield? I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to add just a sentence. The gentleman from Pennsylvania put that construction on it when he said it would raise a billion dollars of tax each year.

Mr. BURTNESS. I thank the gentleman. Certainly that is true, for I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his seat as to whether that is what it did, and he replied in the affirmative very frankly. This, of course, means a property tax of 2 per cent yearly. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. La-GUARDIA] apparently did not follow the reading of the amendment closely and talk about something very different from the proposal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden1.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] says the corporations evade taxes by putting profits into surplus. Of course, they do not and can not evade the 13 per cent agreement as to when to close debate on this amendment.

corporation tax. They will pay the 13 per cent tax upon all net profits, including the surplus set aside each and every year, and then if a surplus is set aside one year which will naturally contribute to the profits made by the corporation the next year, the profits obtained through that surplus are again taxed 13 per cent, and so on down the line each

Now, the important thing in this matter is what the effect will be of what the gentleman really proposes in respect to this particular bill. We are not confronted here with the simple question of whether you are going to raise these additional taxes suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the amendment, for you are confronted with repealing a provision for which he has offered his own amendment as a substitute. The language which he proposes to strike out bases the tax upon the sound principle of getting it from those who are able to pay; that is, getting the tax from the incomes of the corporations. The only tax that is avoided at any time by a corporation through building up its surplus is the surtax, which would be paid by stockholders if the profits were distributed as dividends.

The committee has strengthened the present law with reference to reaching those corporations that build up surpluses instead of distributing their dividends in order to save their stockholders from payment of surtaxes. If the language carried for that purpose is still not effective, let us make it so.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to strike out subdivision (c) which makes it possible to tax corporations which accumulate surpluses to evade the surtax, and, surely, the gentleman does not want to do that, but that is the immediate amendment before you. Of course, he substitutes another tax to take the place of it. But to start with you will take away the right, if you adopt the amendment, to add 50 per cent of the amount of net income to the tax, as provided in section 104, of those corporations which attempt to evade the payment of surtaxes by building up a surplus, and, surely, no man in the House wants to do that.

But let us examine the substitute more closely. He proposes to penalize by a property tax of 2 per cent upon accumulated surpluses, every corporation which is engaged in business, whether such surplus is built up for the purpose of evading surtaxes, or whether the management accumulates such surplus for the protection of its business, for the proper development and expansion of the business, and for the safeguarding of labor and capital engaged therein as well as its clients or customers. [Applause.]

The gentleman by this amendment, by an annual capital or property tax of 2 per cent upon existing surpluses, would tax the surplus, practically the reserve above original capital stock, of every bank in your community and take away the protection of that surplus, or at least give an incentive to the bank to do so by distributing the surplus to the stockholders, from the depositors of such banks. The tendency would be to reduce the security which the depositors may now have through the surpluses that have been built up by sound financial institutions. That would not be good business. The general public good requires reasonable reserves in all lines of business to take care of their wants when times of depression come. All profits should not be distributed in good times. Some must be retained for foul weather. All profits are, of course, subject to the 13 per cent corporation

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. How are we going to reach those individuals who incorporate themselves as corporations and then take their income and, instead of paying any income tax on it, build up a surplus?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I object. Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I ask if we can get any Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I do not want any more time, but I would like the gentleman to state the full meaning of section 104 and whether it will do what we are trying to do at this time

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendment thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bland). The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendment to the amendment close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I want to speak for a few minutes on the operation of the so-called surpluses and what they do to aid employment. I happen to be connected with an industrial concern that has several million dollars of surplus, and when this depression came along we took that money and put it to work, without reducing the workmen's wages, by building up an inventory during the time that we could not sell goods. [Applause.] If this amendment is passed, I want to warn you that no industry will keep and maintain a surplus for such a purpose.

There is a new thought, and before we vote on this, those of you who are friendly to labor and men who are out of work, before you tax this surplus, you should think it over.

Let me give you an illustration. Here is a board of directors, and they move to take a million or two dollars of the surplus and put it into a special reserve fund. The money goes into a reserve fund, and it is put to work to build up an inventory, paying out wages, securing raw material, and when the time comes that we can sell the goods the board of directors passes the money back into the surplus.

It is my belief and my judgment that if this amendment passes that this reserve surplus will have to be paid out in cash as dividends or as in stock dividends, and will not be available for workmen of the country in times of stress.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will be an inducement for them to pay it out in stock dividends, and to that extent the Treasury would not receive any income under this proposal.

Mr. GOSS. That is correct. What I am trying to do is to vote down the tax proposed, so that it will encourage concerns to keep a certain amount in surplus; when trouble comes then they can maintain a useful working force. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to go along on any kind of a business program that is sound and fair in order to balance the Budget, but I am not going to do something which I know will strike at the very heart of the economic structure of these companies. What are the facts?

How are these 52 per cent of the corporations operating to-day? They are operating on reserves. Thank God that there have been some corporations which, either for the purpose of dodging income tax or for some other reason, kept their reserves, so that they can keep affoat at this time. And now you would come in here and levy this tax to strike out the very thing that has made possible what industrial operation we have in this country to-day. You would strike at every bank reserve in this country, and there would not be 1 bank in 10 out in my country now open if it did not have a good reserve. Oh, sure, you can get this money if you want to levy a direct property tax, and that is what this is, and nothing less. You are levying a direct property tax upon a saving which has been created to tide over such times as these. There is a corporation in my district that for over a year and a half has had no business, but has been operating at a loss. It has in this way kept over 500 men at work. How has that corporation paid them? It has paid them out of its reserve. I am not going to say that a reserve is iniquitous under these circumstances. This is a tax to penalize the savings which are making it possible for the country to survive to-day. [Applause.] It is worse than conscripting wealth, because it is conscripting labor from those who now have employment and who are receiving their pay from the reserves. That is all there is to this amendment. If you wish to penalize the corporation which does not declare dividends at this time, then confine your tax to that part of the income earned each year, but you will not do that. That is not this amendment, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden] knows that it is not this amendment. He wishes to tax this reserve that has been accumulated because it is the only way to obtain enough money to balance the Budget without the sales tax.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rather agree with the gentleman's position that this is a property tax in so far as it is a levy on accumulated reserves, but if it is a property tax, direct, then Congress has not the power to levy it, has it? The Supreme Court has said it can not do it.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am quite certain that it is going to take something more than the Constitution of the United States to keep this Congress from doing what it wants to do for the time being. [Laughter.] They may not get any money or accomplish their purpose, but they will back up the bill. If you want to be honest about this, then levy it as a tax against undistributed income of each year. A corporation in my town to-day is paying 4½ per cent on its capital stock and surplus as a State tax, and now you are coming along with a property tax of 2 per cent more on its accumulations. This runs counter to everything that has been advocated on this floor by those who are enemies of the sales tax. They say, tax earnings, tax those who are able to pay; but I say to you do not tax the savings, and that is what the reserves are.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask unanimous consent to withdraw this amendment at this time, because it properly belongs to section 104. It will be perfected and offered at the proper place in the bill; before doing that, because of the discussion that has taken place, I point out the fact that this accumulated surplus which is referred to by the Treasury Department comes from three sources. One of the sources is from accumulated earnings of past years, another source is from the sale of capital stock at a premium, and the other is from current earnings. This surplus belongs to the stockholders of the corporations. This is a fund which the big corporations of the country have been using to perpetuate and further their control of industry and finance in this country.

During 1927, 1928, and 1929 hundreds of millions of dollars of this surplus which belongs to the stockholders was used by the heads of these corporations in the stock market in the orgy of speculations that was then taking place, and large profits were made from that source. When the panic struck these corporations they invested these funds in tax-exempt securities, holding the balance in cash to a very large extent. It seems to me that this surplus should be distributed to a large amount. I do not say it should all be paid to the stockholders, and there are probably fifteen to twenty million of them, but some of it should, and if so paid would be a purchasing power at this time. These surplus funds are not all needed by these corporations, and many of them are boasting now of the splendid condition they are in, in spite of what has been said here on the floor of the House.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Of the corporations in the United States which have built up reserves, would the gentleman say that as many as 2 per cent have used those reserves for gambling purposes?

Mr. McFADDEN. I would say a larger per cent.

Mr. McGUGIN. What percentage would the gentleman say?

Mr. McFADDEN. A large percentage of the big corporations, because there was invested in the stock market in loans for the account of others, in the speculative orgy which the Federal reserve claimed they had no power to control, something over $4,000,000,000 at one time.

Mr. McGUGIN. What percentage of the corporations of the United States would the gentleman estimate carried on that practice?

Mr. McFADDEN. A large number.

Mr. McGUGIN. Would the gentleman enact a measure that would penalize every legitimate reserve in order to get after a few malefactors?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not think a levy of 2 per cent would impair the solidity of any corporation in the United States to-day, and I again call the gentleman's attention to the fact that these corporations are very liquid in cash resources, having over $10,000,000,000 invested in tax-exempt securities and twenty-two billions on deposit in banks and in cash.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Section 104, if properly applied, is more drastic. The only difficulty with section 104 is that it has been on the books but has not been administered. If we can have assurance, or so rewrite section 104 as to reach these corporations, which I am sure the gentleman from Kansas has in mind, I think it will not be necessary to adopt any other change.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman not admit that this reaches every corporation in the United States, down to every little bank?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman withdrawing the amendment at this point. The House has debated it and is just as well prepared to vote now as at any other time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Mc-

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FADDEN 1.

SEC. 14. TAXABLE PERIOD EMBRACING YEARS WITH DIFFERENT LAWS

If a taxable period embraces portions of two calendar years for which the laws are different, the tax shall be computed as provided in section 105.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardial has asked me to please say what I understood section 104 to mean. This is a matter that the experts of the Treasury Department and the legislative drafting bureau of the House have been considering for 15 years, trying to devise some method whereby these accumulated unnecessary surpluses could be taxed when they were withheld from distribution for the purpose of evading taxes. Section 104 provides that any corporation, no matter how organized or for what purpose originally organized, if it were organized as a holding company to evade taxes or if it were organized for other purposes and used for the purpose of evading taxes, the income held in those holding companies from distribution was subject to a 50 per cent tax.

Of course, like all laws, some human being had to administer it, and I grant that it is hard sometimes to get proof to make out a case. It is up to the Treasury Department to decide. But this section provides that any corporation which attempts to hold those earnings to evade taxes is subject to a 50 per cent tax.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Of course, we are in complete agreement as to the end sought. It simply occurred to me that, in the light of the experience of the past, the section should be so drafted as to provide the necessary machinery, with sufficient teeth in it, to accomplish the purpose which the House has in mind.

Mr. CRISP. I understand the Treasury is earnestly seeking to enforce that, and if the gentleman has some perfecting amendment when that section is reached I know the Committee of the Whole House will be delighted to consider it.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that that section as now drawn, and is it the opinion of the experts in the Treasury Department, that section 104 as drawn in this bill can be successfully enforced?

Mr. CRISP. They think it is the best they can do.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) Annuttes, etc.: Amounts received (other than amounts paid by reason of the death of the insured and interest payments on such amounts) under a life insurance, endowment, or annuity contract, but if such amounts (when added to amounts received before the taxable year under such contract) exceed the aggregate premiums or consideration paid (whether or not paid during the taxable year) then the excess shall be included in gross income. In the case of a transfer for a valuable consideration, by assignment or otherwise, of a life insurance, endowment, or annuity contract, or any interest therein, only the actual value of such consideration and the amount of the premiums and other sums subsequently paid by the transferee shall be exempt from taxation under paragraph (1) or this paragraph.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to inquire if the paragraph would permit of the purchasing of an annuity during a lifetime, for the purchaser himself, and thereby avoid taxation. In other words, suppose an annuity of $5,000 a month is purchased for the remainder of life, would that income so purchased be subject to taxation under the provisions of this act?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I will have to say to my friend the gentleman from New York that I can not answer his question. I will ask the experts from the Treasury Department to investigate it and will try to give an answer. I will not give an answer to the gentleman or anyone else that I do not know, because I do not want to give any misinformation, and I do not have the information at hand at this time.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I confess that in reading the section and in studying the bill I was puzzled, and I shall be glad to get the information at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is apparent to the Chair that there is a typographical error in line 11, page 17. The word "or" should be "of." Without objection, the Clerk will make the correction accordingly.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(h) Loss on Sale of Stock or Securities: For disallowance of loss deduction in the case of sales of stock or securities where within 60 days before or after the date of the sale the taxpayer has acquired substantially identical property, see section 118.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment. There is a typographical error. It was intended to be "30 days" instead of "60 days."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 23, line 13, strike out "sixty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain wherein the committee has changed the basis of allowing compensation for losses in the sale of stock and securities? When I read this subparagraph (h) and considered the amendment of "60" instead of "30 days," I concluded the committee was trying to make more difficult these sham negotiations, where persons having stock which had fallen greatly in value sold them, only to buy them again after a 30-day period. I thought the 60 days was relating to that character of transaction, to make it more difficult to receive any credit that would be allowed by the Government.

Mr. CRISP. The committee did not make any correction in that regard. The gentleman's inquiry is directed to the highly technical administration of income tax law, and I am not an income-tax expert. I do not believe I could answer very satisfactorily to the gentleman all of the details of the change. The change was made for the purpose of stopping these wash sales, to try to hold the money in the Treasury under the existing law. They could conduct these wash sales and sustain a loss and then set that off against income from salary or income from the investment. The committee has sought to stop that.

About the wisest thing I can say to my friend is to ask him to read the report on that provision, because I asked the Treasury experts to write the report dealing with all of these administrative changes, giving in detail what the changes were, because I thought it would be more helpful to the House and would be a clearer and a more satisfactory explanation than I could make on the floor. I repeat, I am not an income-tax expert.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recall that the President in his message some years ago referred to this practice, whereby the Government was deprived of millions of dollars by the shuffling of securities just before the taxable year ends. The provision the committee recommends applies, I believe, for the coming and subsequent fiscal years only and not to past fiscal years.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend that under the old law they could bring some of these losses forward and use them for three years. We have cut that down to two. We have sought to plug up the hole the gentleman speaks of. The draft was perfected by Mr. Beaman, of the House Legislative Drafting Bureau, Mr. Parker, and Treasury experts, and it is estimated that this amendment will save $75,000,000 or $100,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. The amendment, as I understand, is changed from 60 days, as printed in the bill, to 30 days. What will be the difference? I assume that 60 days would be short enough time.

Mr. CRISP. Under existing law it is 30 days, but in drafting the bill an error was made and 60 days were improperly included in the bill. We are simply restoring that to the time as it is at present, because we did not intend to change the section.

Mr. FREAR. What would be the objection to 60 days instead of 30 days? That would provide against immediate transfers.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend this is simply a cross reference to the main section, section 118. By reason of a typographical error in this cross section it was written 60 days when it should have been 30 days.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(1) Depletion: In the case of mines, oil and gas wells, other natural deposits, and timber, a reasonable allowance for depletion and for depreciation of improvements, according to the peculiar conditions in each case; such reasonable allowance in all cases to be made under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary. In the case of leases the deduction shall be equitably apportioned between the lessor and lessee. In the case of property held by one person for life with remainder to another person, the deduction shall be computed as if the life tenant were the absolute owner of the property and shall be allowed to the life tenant. In the case of property held in trust the allowable deduction shall be apportioned between the income beneficiaries and the trustee in accordance with the pertinent provisions of the instrument creating the trust, or, in the absence of such provisions, on the basis of the trust income allocable to each. (For percentage depletion in case of oil and gas wells see sec. 114 (b) (3).)

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word simply for the purpose of asking if there is any change in this paragraph?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. None.

Mr. RAGON. No. That is the present law.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

(m) Basis for depreciation and depletion: The basis upon which depletion, exhaustion, wear and tear, and obsolescence are to be allowed in respect of any property shall be as provided in section 114.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the bill corrects existing law on depreciation as construed by the courts, which I understand was the cause of a great portion of the refunds which the department was compelled to make. Have those loopholes been filled in?

Mr. RAGON. I do not think we made any change in relation to that particular question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The subcommittee on administrative provisions gave most of its time and attention to the proposition of filling in such gaps and loopholes as the gentleman from New York has in mind. As we go along I am sure the gentleman will find, if he follows the comparative print of the bill, that such changes have been made. However, there is no change here.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. When we get to section 114, I will ask the gentleman to point out the changes.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read, as follows:

(n) Charitable and other contributions: In the case of an individual, contributions or gifts made within the taxable year to or for the use of:

(1) The United States, any State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, for exclusively public purposes:

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this not to make a speech but merely to propound an inquiry to the committee. Is the term "Territory" as used in this section intended to mean incorporated Territories or unincorporated Territories?

Mr. RAGON. It does not mean the Philippine Islands. It means Hawaii and Alaska.

Mr. OSIAS. Does the term "any political subdivision" include the Philippine Islands?

Mr. RAGON. I do not think so.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) A corporation, or trust, or community chest fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual;

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Wolcott: On page 25, line 17, after the word "religious," insert the word "character-building."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think probably the spirit of the act is to allow deductions of gifts made to all organizations which come within the classifications named. Perhaps I am a little too technical, but in analyzing this from the standpoint of organizations such as the Boy Scouts, the Girl Scouts, and possibly the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., it appears to me a strict interpretation of any of the words used would not include any of those organizations. I offer this amendment merely for the purpose of clarification, so that there will be no question in anyone's mind but that the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts, which are properly known as character-building organizations, are included within the terms of this act.

Mr. RAGON. I will say to the gentleman that the committee is of the opinion that it is the practice of the Treasury Department to consider such organizations as the gentleman mentions as coming within the terms of this language.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then, I assume the committee would have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RAGON. I would not want to agree to that, since the organizations which the gentleman has suggested are understood to be taken care of under the terms of this section as we have it here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield, with the permission of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott]?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not the effect of the adoption of the gentleman's amendment be to delimit the construction of the word "charitable"?

Mr. RAGON. It might be.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts are not charitable organizations; Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts are not religious organizations or scientific or literary organizations or organizations organized for educational purposes. They are organized solely for the purpose of building character, and for no other purpose. I can see no reason for objecting to this amendment, because apparently it is the spirit of this bill to allow deductions for contributions made to such

Mr. RAGON. May I say to my friend that the language that is employed here permits deductions for contributions made to these very organizations.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope so; and it is in anticipation of that that I offer this amendment, because I am going to offer a similar amendment under the gift-tax provision of the bill.

Mr. RAGON. I will say further to my friend that the term "character building" is a term that is very elastic. It might apply to bad-character building, when what the gentleman wants is good-character building. If the gentleman will permit me to say so, I think this is already just what the gentleman wants.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman from Michigan

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman from Michigan does not take the position that the present law does not permit deductions for contributions to organizations like the Y. W. C. A., Y. M. C. A., Boy Scouts, and so forth?

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is a question as to whether it allows deductions for contributions to Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts. Probably deductions for contributions made to the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. would come under the exemption as to religious organizations.

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, no; they would not come under that at all.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If you could classify them as religious organizations, they would be included; but they are largely character building, as well as religious, and should come within the classification of character building.

Mr. BURTNESS. I hope the gentleman's amendment will not lead to an inference that these exemptions should not be permitted. They have been allowed as deductions in the past.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If it is understood that the organizations mentioned come within the inhibitions of the bill, then the purpose of my amendment has been accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(r) Limitation on stock losses: Losses from sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds (as defined in subsection (v) of this section) which are not capital assets (as defined in section 101) shall be allowed only to the extent of the gains from such sales or exchanges. This subsection shall not apply to a dealer in securities in respect of transactions in the ordinary course of his busiwith his customers.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of submitting an inquiry to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. This provision, I believe, is one of the many very excellent provisions added to the existing law, and this would prevent, as I understand it, the use of wash sales or losses on stock speculations to be deducted from the net income, limited only to deductions from profits made by similar transactions.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is correct, and I think this is one of the most valuable changes in the bill. It is under this provision that we hope to prevent these wash sales and save the Treasury from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000. This provision is explained in detail in the report and examples are given, and I shall ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein the explanation of this change written by the tax experts of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman and his committee for this very excellent provision in the bill.

Mr. CRISP. Under existing circumstances the congratulations are very warmly received. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein the explanation of this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

SECTION 23 (R), (S), (T), (U), AND (V), STOCK LOSSES

There are no provisions in existing law corresponding to section 23 (r), (s), (t), (u), and (v). Many taxpayers have been completely or partially eliminating from tax their income from salaries, dividends, rents, etc., by deducting therefrom losses sustained in the stock and bond markets, with serious effect upon the revenue. Your committee is of the opinion that some limitation ought to be placed on the allowance of such losses.

Subsection (r) provides that losses from the sale or exchange of stocks and bonds held for less than two years shall be deductible only to the extent of the gains from sales or exchanges of such securities. The same rule is applied by subsection (s) to losses from stocks and bonds held for more than two years. In case the losses from sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds held for less than two years exceed the gains from such transactions, subsection (t) (1) permits the taxpayer to offset such excess losses against his gains from the sale or exchange of stocks and bonds held for more than two years.

losses against his gains from the sale or exchange of stocks and bonds held for more than two years.

If the losses from the sale or exchange of stocks and bonds held for more than two years exceed the gains from such transactions, the taxpayer is also permitted by subsection (t) (2) to offset such excess against gains derived from the sale or exchange of stocks and bonds held for less than two years, subject to the condition that in such case the tax must not be less than the tax which would be payable if the limitation on stock losses were not in the bill. This condition is necessary to carry out the not in the bill. This condition is necessary to carry out the long-established policy of Congress to tax gains from the sale or tong-established policy of congress to that a same of the exchange of stocks and bonds held for more than two years at the rate of 12½ per cent only and, conversely, to afford relief from taxes on ordinary income only to the extent of 12½ per cent of taxes on ordinary income only to the extent of 12½ per cent of the losses sustained from similar transactions.

Subsection (u) requires that gains or losses from short sales of stocks and bonds, or from privileges or options to buy such securities, shall be treated as gains or losses from the sale or exchange of stocks and bonds held for less than two years. Your committee is of the opinion that there should be no distinction between such transactions and other sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds. Accordingly, the limitation on stock losses is extended and bonds. Accordingly, the limitation on stock losses is extended to this type of transactions.

Under subsection (v) the term "stocks and bonds" is defined.

Under subsection (v) the term "stocks and bonds" is defined. Federal, State, and municipal bonds are excluded from the definition so as not to hamper the sales of such securities. Bonds of foreign governments are also excluded.

The committee is of the opinion that these restrictions as to stock and bond losses should not apply to a dealer in securities—that is, a merchant of securities—whether an individual, partnership, or corporation, with an established place of business regularly engaged in the purchase of securities at wholesale and their resale to customers; and that even such a merchant should be subresale to customers; and that even such a merchant should be sub-ject to the restriction on stock and bond losses except as to his transactions with his customers in the regular course of his business. Under this provision the restriction on stock losses will not apply to a banking institution which underwrites a bond issue and then sells the bonds either to other banks, for resale by them, or to its other customers. Traders or other taxpayers who buy and sell securities for investment or speculation, whether or not on their own account, and irrespective of whether such buying or selling constitutes the carrying on of a trade or business, are not regarded by your committee as dealers in securities within the meaning of this rule.

The effect of these subsections is shown by the following examples:

Example A

Losses from sales of stock held less than 2 years____ $1,000,000 Gains from sales of stock held less than 2 years____ Excess of losses over gains_____

The taxpayer has no other stock or bond transactions. Under section 23 (r) the taxpayer loses the excess loss of $300,000 which he would be entitled to offset against other income under the

Example B

Losses from sales of stock held more than 2 years____ $1,000,000 Gains from sales of stock held more than 2 years____ 700,000 Excess of losses over gains ___ 300,000

The taxpayer has no other stock or bond transactions. In this case the taxpayer is not entitled to any allowance for the excess loss of $300,000, under section 23 (s).

138,000

Losses from sales of stock held less than 2 years	$1,000,000
Gains from sales of stock held less than 2 years	300,000
Excess of losses over gains	700,000
Gains from sales of stock held more than 2 years	1,500,000
Losses from sales of stock held more than 2 years	500,000
Excess of gains over losses	1,000,000

Under subsection (t) (1) the taxpayer may offset the $700,000 loss from sales of stock held less than two years against the $1,000,000 gain from sales of stock held more than two years, and the $300,000 balance is taxable at the rate of 121/2 per cent under the capital gains provision.

Example D

Losses from sales of stock held more than 2 years	$1,000,000
Gains from sales of stock held more than 2 years	300,000
Excess of losses over gains	700,000
Gains from sales of stock held less than 2 years	1,500,000
Losses from sales of stock held less than 2 years	500,000
Excess of gains over losses	1,000,000

Under subsection (t) (2) the taxpayer is entitled to apply the excess loss against the excess gain, provided that the tax shall not be less than a tax which would be payable if the provisions limiting stock losses were not included in the law. The effect of this subsection and the limitation is shown by the following computation based upon the figures in example D, in connection which it is assumed that in addition to his income from sales of which it is assumed that, in addition to his income from sales of stocks, the taxpayer had income (other than from sales or exchanges) in excess of $100,000.

than 2 years (subsec. (s) operating alone)______ Increase in tax due to stock transactions if the losses $460,000 were offset against the gains without limitation (computed under subsecs. (s) and (t) (2) without applying the limitation contained in the second sentence of

The Clerk read as follows:

(3) "Earned net income" means the excess of the amount of the earned income over the sum of the earned income deductions. If the taxpayer's net income is not more than $5,000. his entire net income shall be considered to be earned net income; and if his net income is more than $5,000, his earned net income shall not be considered to be less than $5,000. In no case shall the earned net income be considered to be more than $12,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is considerable criticism abroad that we do not distinguish between earned income and unearned income; that we do not tax more heavily the man who cuts coupons than the man who works hard and has the ability to make a high salary. I understand that the committee recommends cutting down the earned income from $30,000 to $12,000. Was it the idea that you are going to place all persons on a parity, whether they earn the income or not, when the income is above $12,000?

Mr. CRISP. I will say that for years, ever since we have had an income tax law, the argument has been that a man who by his brain earns an income, should not be taxed as heavily as the man who derives a similar income from investment.

It always presented a great many administrative difficulties in working out the plan, because sometimes a man's income is derived partly from investment and partly from personal service. For instance, a man owns a small store. He has capital invested in it; he works; and therefore has income is partly earned and partly unearned.

Some years ago they put a provision in the law that all income under $5,000 was to be termed earned income, and gave a reduction.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was presumed that every person who had an income of $5,000 would be considered as having earned that income, and beyond that it was not earned.

Does the gentleman recall-I do not know whether the gentleman was here at the time the first income-tax bill was presented which we discussed-whether it would not be possible to place a tax on earned income and a higher tax on unearned income?

Mr. CRISP. I remember that. The committee has proceeded on the theory that the average man was faring well if he was given a reduction on $12,000, and we felt that a man making more than $12,000 who had the ability to make that sum-should pay the same amount of tax as other citizens with like income and not be given a reduction on that part of the income in excess of $12,000. Whether that is sound reasoning or not, that is the reason that the committee had

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman advise us whether the Treasury Department claimed that there was any difficulty in determining what is earned income and what is not?

Mr. CRISP. Yes; they presented that to the committee. They said that it was difficult at times to determine in certain cases whether the income was earned or unearned. The Treasury Department has always been sympathetic with the idea of making a differential in favor of earned incomes.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are still recognizing the difference between earned and unearned income, except that we are cutting down the allowance of the man who makes it from 30 to 12.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; upon the theory that after he is given $12,000 we lower the tax, under the theory of paying according to the ability to pay, and he can pay the full tax on the income in excess of $12,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would levy the higher rate on the man who cuts the coupons instead of on the brains that run the country.

The Clerk read as follows:

PART III-CREDITS AGAINST TAX

SEC. 31. TAXES OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES AND POSSESSIONS OF UNITED STATES

The amount of income, war profits, and excess-profits taxes imposed by foreign countries or possessions of the United States shall be allowed as a credit against the tax, to the extent provided in section 131.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Johnson of Missouri: Strike out lines 2 to 7, inclusive, on page 36.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I understand what the gentleman has in view, and I presume if his amendment prevails, he will move to strike out section 131 when it is reached.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, section 31 which I move to strike out, provides that a credit shall be given on the income tax for all taxes, income, war profits, and excess-profits taxes imposed by foreign countries. Under the income tax law, the citizens who have invested all their money here at home are permitted to take a credit for taxes paid, only against the income, yet under the provisions of this section a person owning property in a foreign country or receiving an income from foreign investments is permitted to take a credit for the entire amount of the tax imposed by the foreign country against the income tax imposed by the United States. That is an unfair discrimination against our citizens.

It is a well-known fact that because of the operation of the iniquitous tariff law many corporations which had earned a large amount of money because of that tariff law went into foreign countries and organized corporations or subsidiaries there so that they could escape the effect of the retaliatory tariff laws enacted by those foreign countries. In those foreign countries, with the money received under the protection of the tariff laws of the United States. those corporations are now manufacturing products with foreign labor and supplying the foreign markets, markets which formerly were supplied by products made in America with American labor. Because of that fact, they have closed many factories in the United States and thrown countless millions of laboring men into the already swollen tide of the unemployed. Under the provisions of this law we tell those corporations that they may take the money earned in the United States into foreign countries, invest it, and use it in competition with American capital and labor, receive their income, and when they pay the foreign countries a tax that we shall let them apply the amount of such | tax as a credit against the tax imposed by the United States. I submit that is not fair and just to the laborers and industries at home, for this reason—that if somebody should throw a brick into the window of one of the buildings of those corporations in a foreign country they would ask the United States to send the Army and Navy over there to protect their property. If that be true, and they have received the protection of the United States, then they ough to be put on an equal basis with the citizens of the United States who use their capital and labor in the homeland. If we want to allow them credit for the tax imposed by a foreign country, it is all right to allow it to the same extent that we allow credit to the other citizens of the United States; that is, wholly against the income and not against the tax itself. We are asked to impose an iniquitous and obnoxious sales tax upon our people to-day in their distress and despair which will sap the very lifeblood out of the people, yet we are telling these corporations, in effect, that they need not pay any income tax if they have gone into a foreign country and invested their money. Personally I should prefer to levy a tax of 75 per cent against all income received from a foreign source. The fact is I think we have been too much concerned, and now are, about international matters and that the time has come when we should forget those international matters and legislate for the American people. This amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I shall try to explain this situation on foreign-tax credit. This credit is only allowed to American citizens and domestic corporations doing business in foreign countries, and it is not allowed to foreigners, except to a very limited extent. Under the law where an American citizen or corporation is doing business in this country and also is doing business in a foreign country, he is allowed to deduct from the tax due the United States the amount of the tax he pays to a foreign country, but not in excess of the same proportion of our tax which the net income from abroad is of the entire net income. Let me illustrate. Say an American corporation does business in the United States and earns $100,000, and earns $100,000 abroad. Fifty per cent of the income of that corporation was earned in the United States and 50 per cent out of the United States. It is an American corporation. If the foreign business was in Great Britain, the corporation tax would be 25 per cent. Under the law in making up the tax returns to the United States the corporation must include the income derived in the United States and out of the United States, and then the corporation is allowed to deduct not from the gross income toward arriving at the net income but from the amount of the tax due the United States, the amount of the tax paid to the foreign country with the limit above stated. In the example above given the corporation could take as a credit against its United States tax under this bill of $26,000-13 per cent of $200,000-one-half of its British tax of $25,000-25 per cent of $100,000-or $12,500.

In this country in the different States any tax paid to the county, State, or city is not deductible from the amount of the tax, but it is deductible from the gross income arriving at your net income. This is an advantage to the American corporations doing business abroad, in being permitted to deduct the amount of the tax they have paid to a foreign country from the amount of the tax due to the United States. I think I violate no secret when I say that I said in the committee that I was not in favor of this provision but desire to treat taxes paid to foreign countries just as they are treated in this country—as reductions from the gross income.

But here is what was presented to the committee: They said that unless these American corporations doing business abroad are given this benefit they can not compete with the foreign countries, because it would mean they would have to pay double taxation on their income derived in the foreign country. I am giving you the facts. I have stated how I personally felt about it. I am just giving you the facts. It was stated that unless this was continued, these American corporations doing business abroad would probably have to withdraw from business because they could not compete with the foreign companies which did not pay these taxes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. I have no desire to speak, but I am trying to give the House the information. It was argued that unless that was continued they would withdraw, and that the United States would lose the amount of net profit they made over there, which was brought to the United States and which increased the wealth of the United States. It was further argued that unless that practice was continued it would seriously interfere with our export trade; that unless they were put on an equal footing with those engaged in foreign business, the Americans could not maintain agencies and sell goods abroad, and they would be compelled to withdraw, and the United States would lose the benefit of that trade and wealth that ultimately resulted from it, in coming to the United States.

There was an amendment made to the bill which made it certain that any American corporation doing business abroad as well as here would have to pay the full corporation tax on all income derived from business done in the United States. Under the existing law, where there are one or two or three foreign agencies, it was possible for the American corporation to pay less than the regular corporation income tax on the income derived in the United States. The committee has recommended an amendment to it which guarantees that the United States Government will receive the full corporate tax on all income earned in the United States, but still the bill as reported leaves them to deduct the tax from the taxes due the United States, within the limits I described before.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I also suggest that in the case of an American company with a subsidiary in a country where there was no corporation tax imposed, prior to the committee amendment, that could in some way be used as a deduction, or they would all be aggregated together and the deduction could be used where the Federal Government would not receive as much tax from the profits in the country where there was no corporation tax as it would under the committee amendment as we reported it. Furthermore, if the corporation tax in a foreign country is 8 per cent, they have to make up the difference between the 8 and the 13 per cent. The members of the committee seemed to be sympathetic with the viewpoint expressed by the chairman, but ultimately we were fearful this might result disadvantageously to American industry trying to create trade in foreign markets. We realized the motives which prompted the gentleman in offering his amendment and we entertained that thought, but there is danger of the complete changing of this law resulting in harm to American industry trying to create our export trade on the foreign markets.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. As I understand it, the proposal recommended by the committee at least stops the possibility of any credit for taxes abroad offsetting the tax upon income earned within the United States?

Mr. CRISP. It does; and our information is that it will mean a saving of six or eight million dollars.

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, I think that has been the great vice of the present law.

Mr. CRISP. Well, I think we have corrected that, and the bill reported will save to the Treasury seven or eight million dollars.

Mr. BURTNESS. So regardless of how large the tax is abroad, there can be no offset from that against the income earned here?

Mr. CRISP. No, sir.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague, Mr. Johnson of Missouri.

If there is one group of individuals in this country who I feel are not deserving of any benefits in this bill, it is that group who made fortunes in this country through the protection of the country, and then sent abroad and invested that money in foreign industry, where they could secure cheap labor, and are manufacturing commodities which had heretofore been manufactured in this country and shipped abroad to the countries where this group set up their industry. [Applause.]

I want to ask the gentlemen from the New England States what was the reason they urged us in the last Congress to place a tax upon shoes. It was because New England money took United Shoe Machinery Co. machines to Czechoslovakia, set up shoe factories in Czechoslovakia, secured cheap labor, and not only made shoes for that country and other countries abroad but are now in a position and are shipping shoes to the United States to compete with the shoes made in the United States. That is the reason the people from the New England States pleaded on this floor for two days to place a tax upon shoes.

That is the reason the New England representatives went before the Tariff Commission and urged an increase in the tariff on shoes of 50 per cent. Why, not being satisfied with destroying our shoe market in foreign countries, they come to this country and in some of the large cities set up retail stores and are selling the shoes made with cheap labor to the American public. This would not be so bad if it was foreign money that started the factories abroad, but I am telling you it was money of American citizens, made in this country by selling their products to Americans. You are going to hear from this in the future. Not only will the shoe industry suffer, but American money has been sent abroad by the millions, hundreds of millions, to be used to start factories manned by cheap labor to manufacture commodities that our American manufacturers formerly sent abroad and sold.

If this amendment affects some legitimate American corporation, then I say word it so that it will exempt them; but find some way to reach the American citizen who has assisted in ruining our foreign trade. My only regret is that the American citizens responsible for this situation of which I complain is that they did not go along with their money and stay in a foreign land.

We are told that a great corporation has opened factories in Ireland and other countries; that parts of tractors and other farm machinery are being manufactured in the foreign factories and shipped to this country, where they are assembled and sold. Why? Because cheap labor can be secured in those foreign countries and because machinery that can be used by the agriculture industry is not required to pay duty.

A great American harvester company is building a plant in Canada, the greatest of all aluminum companies is likewise building a plant in Canada, while Lord Derby was recently quoted as saying, some 25 American manufacturers were looking for locations in England to open branch factories. Of course, in some instances this is done to escape the retaliatory tariffs that have been set up. Every time American money is sent abroad to open up a factory the products of that factory are sold abroad and take the place of the American-made products, made by American labor and formerly sent abroad. They kill the market for our goods.

I shall support this amendment and any other amendment that will strike at the incomes of American citizens who have invested their money in factories in foreign countries to manufacture articles that compete with American-made goods. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly interested in this question, except to the extent of trying to convey to the Members present what I believe to be the true situation. I feel very much the same as the gentleman from Missouri on the question of American capital making its money in America and then sending it abroad for the purpose of creating industry to compete with our own American industries. But that is not the question in this case.

The case the gentleman refers to is where American capital goes abroad and organizes itself in foreign lands and forms its own corporations over there. However, that is not the case of American business that is affected by the question before the committee at the present time. We are considering American business that has established subsidiaries in foreign lands, subsidiaries which are still controlled by the parent companies in the United States. We are not concerned with shoes. What the gentleman says about shoes may or may not be true. I do not know why the gentleman refers to New England, because other parts of the country are interested in shoes. As one coming from New England, I voted against the Hawley-Smoot bill, so the gentleman's remarks have no application to me.

But we want to get at the true issue here. If we want to put an export tax on American capital, that is one thing; but the question is in no way connected with American capital going into foreign lands and establishing itself for the purpose of building up our foreign trade; of selling the product of American labor, or of establishing a business in foreign countries to produce raw materials which can not be produced in the United States and which are brought here to be put in finished form by American labor.

The class of corporations affected are those corporations which go into foreign lands and establish a business for a purpose which they can not establish in the United States. Bananas are not grown here, for example. The United Fruit Co. is an American corporation. They go down to South America and they establish a corporation there. Are we going to penalize a legitimate American business going into foreign fields for the purpose of creating a foreign market for our exportable surpluses? The loss of our foreign markets is one of the conditions which has brought about the present depression.

The committee has recommended in the present bill administrative changes which assure to the Federal Government the amount of the taxes, at least, which would be payable upon income earned in the United States.

So no matter how you vote, gentlemen, vote upon the real issue and not upon an artificial, hysterical issue, no matter how fine it may sound for mob-psychology effect. The exportation of American money to create in other countries business which competes with ours is not involved in this question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. The fact is that there are many corporations in the United States, hundreds of them, which have formed subsidiary corporations in Canada in the last few years. That is true, is it not?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not in sympathy with that, and that has nothing to do with the issue before us.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. They are employing labor and supplying the foreign markets, yet we are telling them they can take credit on income taxes paid in the United States for any income tax that England might impose.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is not the issue involved. Prior to the recommendation of the committee as contained in the pending bill, they paid a lesser tax in the Treasury than they would pay under this bill on income actually earned in the United States. We have protected the Treasury and we have protected legitimate American business which establishes itself in foreign lands for the purpose of building up our foreign markets. The adoption of the pending amendment will seriously interfere with American industry competing in the world markets with industry of other countries and compel the surplus that would be disposed of in normal times in foreign lands to be thrown on the domestic market, thereby preventing the laws of supply and demand domestically to adjust themselves for our best interests. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I rise in support of this motion as made by the gentleman from Missouri. This is the preliminary motion that will be made to strike out section 131, which provides for the return of these foreign taxes.

I can see no reason why a manufacturer in this country who has a branch in another country should profit more than he would in his own country. In other words, if you have a plant in Maine and it has a branch in Tennessee, when you make out your returns in Maine you would credit your gross receipts with the taxes which you had paid in Tennessee, and you would pay 12 per cent on your net profits; but if you have a plant in Maine and you have another one in Canada the tax you pay in Canada you come back here and credit on the tax that you will pay here. That is the difference. It encourages our money to go abroad. It encourages our money to be expended in other countries. It does not encourage industry in this country, where the money ought to be spent.

What is the situation just across the border in Canada? A few days ago I saw in the paper a statement to the effect that 22 per cent of the manufacturing plants in Canada are owned by American citizens. Their money has gone over there, and they have that preference.

It is true this committee has corrected this in some respects, but they have only filled in a hole of $10,000,000 out of about $60,000,000. If you want to raise revenue, according to official statements and if these were prosperous times, you would have at least $60,000,000 out of this.

Under the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] you will pick up at least $30,000,000 and you will do it properly and justly to American citizens.

I trust that this paragraph will be stricken out and then when you come to section 131 and all the necessary paragraphs will be stricken out so that they may pay taxes just as though they were doing business in this country.

Do you know that there is only one country in the world, and that is Italy, that has the same provision that you are offering here with respect to taxation. England does not allow this, Germany does not allow it, and in these times we should not allow it. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am heartily in accord with the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] to strike out this paragraph.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the distinguished acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has indicated in what he has said here to the House that he felt in committee, and I am sure he feels the same way now, that the position taken by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] is correct.

According to my judgment, this provision in this tax bill encourages people to leave this country and go abroad to do business and in that way they are enabled to lessen the amount of income tax paid to this country by offsetting the income they get abroad, and I do hope the House, by its vote, will support the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson], which, as I have already stated, accords with the views held by the distinguished acting chairman of the committee.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask a few questions of the chairman, if I may. I understand that if this paragraph is stricken out, that during the balance of the year 1933 it will bring to us $12,000,000 of additional money.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend from Illinois that they could not make a very satisfactory estimate as to what would come from this, owing to the economic situation in the world. The estimate was made, based on the returns of 1929 or 1930, that if business had held up, it would have been about $35,000,000, but, of course, none of us believes business will hold up to that mark. The estimates ran, as I understand it, from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 as the amount that would come in if the paragraph were eliminated. They also figured, with the changes made, to guarantee that if the United States would receive the full corporate tax on the income earned in the United States by these American companies also having foreign businesses, it would be about six or seven million dollars.

Mr. KELLER. May I suggest to the gentleman that I asked the question for this reason: Last summer down in my little home town in southern Illinois I stepped into a Ford agency and I looked at an ordinary Ford tractor. Accidentally, I took hold of the card attached to it, giving the price, and it said, "Made in Ireland." I made inquiry, and I was astonished to find that it really was made in Ireland and brought back here to the United States. I then also accidentally found in the January Labor Review, issued by our Bureau of Labor Statistics, a full report on this subject, and I was going to ask whether that had been put in the hands of the committee, showing that American capital to the extent of many, many millions of dollars has gone abroad and established these factories, and they are shipping their stuff back here, not only in competition on the American market, but they are directly taking the labor away from the Americans in this country.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. If this paragraph is stricken out, will it change the effect with respect to taxes upon the Ford Co. in Ireland?

Mr. KELLER. I hope so.

Mr. WHITE. I doubt it, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee about that.

Mr. KELLER. That is what I was driving at.

Mr. CRISP. Here is what was told to us. Of course, the committee discussed these American businesses abroad, and the Ford Co. was mentioned, and this is the thought that was suggested to the committee: If this were changed, these companies would surrender their American charters, would obtain a charter abroad, would do business over there and keep the earnings there, and the United States would get no tax whatever from any earnings made out of this country.

Mr. KELLER. The question I want to get to is this: If this will not correct the condition, is there any means of correcting such an abuse?

Mr. CRISP. I can not answer my friend. I have tried to give the House the benefit of all the information I have, and I am not myself, of course, advocating this provision, but as chairman of the committee I desired to give all the information about the matter that I could.

Mr. RAGON. This would bring in but very little revenue. It would cause them to withdraw their American identity and become a foreign identity, and also in many cases they would cease business there and consolidate with the mother company here. We would not gain much in the way of revenue.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, this is what the amendments made by the committee on section 131 will do:

First. If an American corporation has an income of $100,000 in this country and $100,000 in another country, if the rate of taxation abroad is the same as it is in this country, 13 per cent, we will get the tax at that rate on $100,000 earned in this country, and that only.

That is on the principle that a country should tax only the income derived within its borders or its possessions. Every country should be an entity, apart from every other country in the matter of taxation. If the rate of taxation is the same here and abroad, we receive 13 per cent on $100,000 earned in this country.

Second. If a corporation earns $100,000 here and $100,000 abroad, and the tax abroad should be only 6 per cent, then we would get 13 per cent on the $100,000 earned here and 7 per cent on the $100,000 earned abroad.

Third. However, if a corporation earns $100,000 here and $100,000 abroad, and the tax abroad is 25 per cent, we still get the full 13 per cent on the $100,000 earned here, even if the corporation has paid 25 per cent on the $100,000 earned abroad.

would come in if the paragraph were eliminated. They also figured, with the changes made, to guarantee that if the United States would receive the full corporate tax on the income earned in the United States by these American compercent on the amount earned abroad. So, in any case, we get at least 13 per cent on the income earned in this country and may get additional amounts from incomes earned abroad in countries whose rates are lower than ours.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if a corporation had $100,000 earned income here and $100,000 earned income in a foreign country, and the tax on the income in the foreign country was 15 per cent, we would still get 13 per cent on the $100,000 earned in this country?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; in every instance.

Mr. BURTNESS. That is not the present law?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; the committee amended the present law so that a corporation which pays a higher tax abroad will not, for that reason, pay less than the full amount of taxes on incomes earned in this country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Oregon be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. Mr. FRENCH. Could the gentleman advise the committee what the practice of foreign countries is in the matter of taxation rates? Are the rates, to use the illustration that he has used, 13 per cent, 25 per cent, and 6 per cent?

Mr. HAWLEY. They vary. I think the English rate is 271/2 per cent.

Mr. FRENCH. Is it not true that they are usually much higher than are proposed here?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are instances where they are higher. There may be some where they are lower. I think I never saw a complete list of such taxes imposed by foreign countries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

vield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take, for instance, industries of my home State. They have branch offices in London for the sale of their wares. They maintain a separate organization over there to sell to the foreign trade. The profit derived from that branch in London must necessarily pay, as well as the American citizens who are employed thereand one of them is a former secretary of mine-the local income-tax rate. Does this provision prevent the American manufacturer from having offset the income tax that Great Britain exacts for the amount of trade that branch office does in London under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson]?

Mr. HAWLEY. The pending amendment proposes to eliminate from the bill the committee amendments I have just illustrated.

Mr. STAFFORD. What will be the result of that? It will discourage our foreign trade. We are putting a penalty on American manufacturers engaging in foreign trade and will deter them from going into foreign markets.

Mr. HAWLEY. It was my purpose in rising to insist that we were getting our full American tax in every instance under the amendments proposed in the bill before us, and in some instances a larger amount. If the foreign rate was lower than ours, we were getting an additional amount based upon the difference in the rates; and if there is no foreign tax, we get the tax on the income earned here and the tax on the income earned abroad. We are protecting the revenue of the United States. The pending amendment should be defeated. To require that there be paid to the United States the full tax on both the income earned here and earned abroad, when the income earned abroad is taxed in the foreign country would be indefensible double taxation.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter and I understand the gentlemen on the minority side have a conference to-night. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill of 1932, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, our Heavenly Father, who dwellest in the radiance of that light which no mortal can approach and where no unclean thing can enter, cleanse the thoughts of our hearts; grant us forgiveness of our sins and assure us of Thy favor. In our exultant moments and in our anxious dreads be with us and awaken in us those deep vibrations which are deeper than all other truths. In every situation may we have a passion of zeal and exercise a wise, resolute industry in the service of our country. O Thou who givest liberally and upbraidest not, bless us with that spirit that forgives easily, generously, and completely. We pray that our energies may be in close and constant relation to the great duty and help we owe the well-being of the Republic. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE SALES TAX

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record a letter written to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, in response to my letter to him calling attention to his speech of December 14, when he expressed himself against the sales tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following letter written to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, relative to the sales tax:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 17, 1932.

My Dear Congressman LaGuardia: I have your letter of March 16, in which you state that you find some difficulty in reconciling my speech of December 14, 1931, before the Economic Club of New York with the radio speech I delivered last Saturday. As a matter of fact, there is no inconsistency.

matter of fact, there is no inconsistency.

In my speech of December 14, after referring to the Canadian sales tax and pointing out that, in view of our general reluctance to grant administrative discretion, the adoption of the Canadian manufacturers' sales tax would involve real administrative difficulties, I went on to say: "In any event, we concluded that, on the whole, it is wiser for us to resort to those forms of taxation with which we have had experience and are thoroughly familiar rather than to embark on new and untried ventures." I then went on to discuss the recommendations of the Treasury Department, which included a sharp increase in the rates applicable to individual incomes, an increase in the estate-tax rates, an increase in the rate of existing excise taxes, and the imposition of a number of excise taxes, some of which were in the 1921 act, some in the 1924 act, and some new ones.

In my radio speech of March 12 I spoke, as follows: "I happen to be one who in the past has not favored a sales tax. I prefer a tax system consisting of a progressive tax on individual incomes with a broad base, a corporation income tax, an estate tax, customs duties, and a selective group of excise taxes."

It appears, then, that in December the Treasury Department

It appears, then, that in December the Treasury Department recommended to the Congress a very definite program which did not include a manufacturers' sales tax. On December 14 I made a speech in support of the Treasury program. On March 12 I restated my personal preference. Far from being inconsistent, the record is one of complete consistency. But the Constitution of the United States provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." In accordance with this constitutional function the appropriate committee of the House of Representatives has prepared a revenue measure which does not include the system of selected excise taxes recommended by this department, but substitutes therefor a manufacturers' excise tax. Except for this difference in method of raising part of the needed additional revenue, the measure follows, generally speaking, the recommendations made by this department with a view to balancing the Budget in 1933.

operating, the recommendations made by this department with a view to balancing the Budget in 1933.

The question asked me was whether the bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee was acceptable to the Treasury Department. I have stated that it is, and I have given my reasons. I said:

"This does not mean that I agree with every part of the proposed revenue-law. If anyone wants to be entirely satisfied with a tax bill he must write it himself; and even then, unless supported by the valor of ignorance he must under existing conditions have grave misgivings. The bill differs in many respects from the recommendations made by the Treasury Department. We are prepared, however, to accept the conclusions of the com-We are prepared, however, to accept the conclusions of the committee and to support the measure which they recommend. It conforms to sound tax principles, the difficulties of administration are, not insuperable, and above all it makes possible the attainment of the one vital objective—a balanced Budget. * * May I repeat: In a great national emergency the Ways and Means Committee has drafted a revenue measure which makes possible the attainment of the main objective—a balanced Budget is the standard of the main objective is the standard of the m possible the attainment of the main objective—a balanced Budget—which is based definitely on the principle that those best able to should contribute in accordance with their ability to do so, and which calls upon all American citizens to make some contribution to the support of the national credit. That there will be some disagreement as to some parts of the bill was to be expected. But as to the necessity for so comprehensive a measure, and as to the broad principles upon which it is based, there can be no disagreement."

Finally, let me say a word about the problem of administration, stated in my speech of December 14 that I was troubled about I stated in my speech of December 14 that I was troubled about the administrative difficulties incident to the collection of a manufacturers' sales tax, largely because I doubted whether Congress would be willing to grant the necessary administrative discretion. But, as I pointed out in the radio talk to which you refer, the administrative provisions as drafted in the Ways and Means Committee bill are such that the discretion granted the Bureau of Internal Revenue seems adequate, and that the doubts which the Treasury at one time entertained on this score have been removed. If Canada and Australia can successfully administer such a tax, if European countries can administer with more or less success still more complicated sales taxes, there is no reason why we can not undertake the task.

You ask me to give you my latest views. My position, I think, no reason why we can not undertake the task.

You ask me to give you my latest views. My position, I think, has been made entirely clear in the speech of December 14 and in the radio talk of March 12, copies of which I inclose. In the first I stated the means which I preferred to meet the present emergency. In the second I stated that the means proposed by a practically unanimous vote of the Ways and Means Committee were acceptable. There is no inconsistency. The main objective is a balanced Budget. I do not feel constrained to oppose a bill which promises attainment of this main objective simply because it does not conform in all particulars with the program recommended by this department.

gram recommended by this department With kind regards, sincerely yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS, Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA. House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD six or seven hundred letters, written in good faith in a personal vein, demanding immediate payment of the bonus and telling why; also some petitions for Federal aid for the great Columbia River Basin irrigation project; also some petitions by county commissioners, mayors, and others for the construction of an inside canal from just inside the mouth of the Columbia River, and from Willapa Harbor to Grays Harbor. This proposal is similar to the Cape Cod Canal, the Beaufort Canal, and the Texas part of the Intercoastal Canal, all of which had Federal support. I also desire to have printed in the Congressional Record petitions signed by some thousands for a plan which is outlined in detail, not more than 40 typewritten pages, for Federal loans to those who would like to build homes. This will help employment and will provide for the use of great quantities of lumber, cement, hardware, labor, and the like. All of these proposals have great merit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman evidently thinks he is in another body, which is indifferent to the expense of publishing the RECORD, and not in the House of Representatives, which generally shows some regard for the taxpayer. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, I suppose I will have to submit, but all of these proposals should be seen and analyzed by all the Members, even if they do not feel quite so liberal as of yore.

REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R.

10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill of 1932, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to make a statement for the information of the House.

Monday is Consent Calendar day under the rules. There is no provision, under the rules, for moving to dispense with it, so this tax bill will not be considered on Monday but will be called up on Tuesday.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. For the information of the House, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Johnson of Missouri: That lines 2 to 7, inclusive, on page 36, be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. On yesterday, before we adjourned, I promised to recognize the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. Ostas].

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the parliamentary situation aright, the amendment presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] to strike out lines 2 to 7, page 36, or all of section 31 allowing credit against taxes of foreign countries and possessions of the United States, is pending for consideration.

The whole discussion so far on this matter has hinged upon the effect that this provision would have upon citizens of the United States and American corporations paying taxes imposed by foreign countries. That feature I am not going to discuss.

I will address myself, however, to its effect upon citizens of America and American corporations in the "possessions of the United States." If the amendment should prosper, I take it that no credit will be given American citizens and corporations for "income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes" paid in the "possessions of the United States."

Mr. Chairman, I think it is clear that I am not speaking for Filipinos. I speak purely out of a sense of duty. Fairness should be meted out to Americans who have invest-ments in "possessions of the United States." This I say despite the fact that many of those people and I have been at loggerheads, for they have sought to obstruct the mission I have been sent to perform in the United States, namely, to advance the cause of Philippine independence; but even so, Mr. Chairman, I think it is nothing but right that I should rise in their behalf since those American citizens and American corporations are subjected to the income tax in those possessions of the United States, and furthermore they are subjected to a sales tax, because we have a sales tax in the Philippine Islands of 11/2 per cent. It seems to me that the amendment should not prosper in so far as it affects crediting against the tax contemplated by this revenue bill "the amount of income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes imposed by possessions of the United States." My sense of right and justice compels me to state emphatically that I do not believe they should be subjected to double taxation. I think that would be indefensible.

Now I wish to interrogate the distinguished acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. CRISP] for clarification. Is the phraseology "possessions of the United States" given a uniform meaning throughout this bill?

Mr. CRISP. As far as I know, it is; and this foreigncredit provision would apply to the taxes paid by Americans in business in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. OSIAS. Then the phrase "possessions of the United States" is, as I interpret it, to include the Philippines?

Mr. CRISP. That is my understanding.

Now I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. OSIAS. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I understand the Philippine government has a sales tax. I would like to know how it operates and whether or not it is very burdensome on the people, or whether there is objection to it among the masses of the people.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, just for a factual statement, I will say in reply to the gentleman that we have had and do now have a sales tax in the Philippines of 1½ per cent. It is the largest single source of revenue at present for the insular government. A committee was appointed by the Philippine Legislature to study and improve the system of taxation in the islands. From the preliminary report of this special committee on taxation submitted to the Philippine Legislature I have gleaned the fact that certain chambers of commerce have made protests against the sales tax, that the consumers have made no complaints at the hearings, and when the committee so charged with this important duty asked chambers of commerce to propose a substitute for the tax there was disagreement among themselves.

Adverting to the questions I asked of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp], I desire to say that I propounded my inquiry in the interest of clarity, because under the present anomalous situation of my country the status of the Philippines is uncertain and indefinite under the laws of the United States. For certain purposes the Philippines are considered within the United States and for other purposes without the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Commissioner from the Philippines may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. I agree with the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands on this proposition. I would suggest, without taking up the time of the committee to draw a distinction between American corporations or individuals building their plants in foreign countries and those building them under the American flag in the Philippines, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Alaska, that he might offer a substitute that would leave the possessions of the United States in the bill, but the rest of it should go out. So far as I am concerned-and I think I speak the sentiment of the majority Members on this side of the aisle who are in favor of the Johnson amendment-I think the gentleman from Missouri would agree to a substitute which would except from the amendment the possessions of the United States, such as the Philippines, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Alaska, because they are already under the American flag; they can not crawl behind two tariffs walls and they are not subject to the criticism of those corporations that go to foreign countries and build their plants, employ the very cheapest labor, get concessions from foreign countries, and then whenever they get in trouble demand that we send the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps to protect them. But the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, Alaska, and Hawaii are under the American flag, and so long as we hold them under the American flag we must give them equal treatment.

Mr. OSIAS. I thank the gentleman. I am in entire accord with his suggestion. I accept it and indorse it to the gentleman from Missouri, suggesting that he modify his amendment so as to put into effect the suggestion made by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. May I suggest to the Commissioner from the Philippines that the gentleman's amendment would strike out the whole section. It seems to me the proper place to cover the cases which the gentleman from Mississippi and the Commissioner from the Philippines have in mind would be when we reach section 131, and then we ought to strip that section of everything except the Philippines, Porto Rico, and the insular possessions. I think that would be the proper way to do it.

Mr. RANKIN. That will take care of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, I think all citizens should be put on a parity. The citizens of the United States ordinarily only get credit for taxes paid against the income. However, I think the objection the gentleman has raised can be taken care of when we arrive at section 131, which deals with this matter in a general way.

Mr. PATTERSON. And if the gentleman will permit, this would apply differently in the Philippine Islands than it would in a State, would it not? In a State the tax is allowed only against the income and not against the tax. If we modified the amendment, I think that would give an unfair discrimination to the Philippines and other insular possessions.

Mr. OSIAS. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. It is understood that I am not pleading for my own countrymen. I am asking for justice to your own fellow citizens. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Commissioner from the Philippines may proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Suppose we accept the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York, and then we can take care of this proposition when we reach section 131.

Mr. OSIAS. I am perfectly satisfied with such an arrangement, and I am ready to accede, especially in view of the fact that the Committee on Insular Affairs has already reported out a Philippine independence bill. While some of these people are still bombarding Members of Congress with their propaganda, I think I see clearly that the sentiment in this body is favorable to independence, and I am happy to make this plea for them. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss this question from an angle somewhat different from the discussions we have had thus far. Our action on this proposition is of far greater importance than might at first seem apparent.

To-day there are around $21,000,000,000 due the American Government and about the same amount due private interests in this country, making a total, if paid according to the Young plan, of somewhere in the neighborhood of $42,000,000,000. There is but $11,000,000,000 of monetary gold in the world. We have $4,000,000,000 of it, which leaves $7,000,000,000, so if they pay us in gold they will have to pay us this gold six different times.

They can not pay us in commodities because at the ports of entry they run against a tariff wall that is insurmountable. Then how are they going to pay it? Some of it will be paid in service to American tourists in Europe, and I dare say some of it may be paid by selling sprigs of the nobility to American heiresses. But these will not be sufficient. A balance must be paid in some other way. It can not be paid in anything they ship into this country. We must receive that payment in industries or industrial investments in foreign countries or something of that kind. Our people must either buy something over yonder or they must take these debts in something they can not bring home. Therefore, while we have millions invested in industries in foreign countries, we are going to have billions over there. If we are going to put a premium on investments in foreign countries, then what are we going to do at home. Even now our people are going over yonder. There is a migration of thousands of people more going to foreign countries than coming this way. I am now speaking with authority because I asked the Immigration Bureau about this and I have been informed that thousands more are going over there than are coming here.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Is it not also a fact that these enterprises that are going to foreign countries are giving employment to foreign labor while American labor is unemployed?

Mr. BARTON. That is partly true, but here is another thing that is equally detrimental to this country. There are a lot of American people going over there and establishing their permanent residence in those countries. We are exporting our own people.

yield?

Mr. BARTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In addition, the Federal Government is coughing up its money to assist aliens who are here out of work and who want to get back to their home countries.

Mr. BARTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As bad as things are in the Virgin Islands, with only 22,000 people, 600 people formerly domiciled in our own purchased Virgin Islands are begging for some way to get back there, although there is no work there.

Mr. BARTON. The only reason in the world for people to go from this country over there is because they can find more satisfactory employment over there. The only reason in the world for capital to go over there is because it can be more satisfactorily invested there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Admitting all that, how does it happen that there are still long lines of people in front of the visa offices in certain cities of principal European countries trying to get visas to come from there to the United States, whether there is work here or not?

Mr. RANKIN. They have not heard the news yet. Mr. BARTON. I do not know anything about the people in foreign countries, but I have seen the idle people in America.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say in the gentleman's time that I hope there will be printed within a few days by the Committee on Immigration the hearings held last Tuesday, which day was given over to statements by the leading communists of the country. Their best leaders, men and women, put forth their strongest statements, and no Member could have heard those statements, challenges, and defies without shivering in his boots. It is a question how much damage it will do when it is printed, but I am in favor of printing it and letting everybody read it.

Mr. BARTON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I do not care to take up any further time. I thank you.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, first I want to suggest to the committee that this paragraph is nothing but a cross reference, that the subject matter is disposed of in section 131.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not at this point.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That was all explained last

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And whether this paragraph remains here or not at this point, the whole subject matter is to be determined when we get to section 131. Something will remain in section 131, and for the orderly procedure of the bill there should be a reference here showing where that subject matter may be found.

I want to suggest the disposition of this paragraph be held over until we reach section 131 and that the two be considered together. Can not that be done?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I concur in what the gentleman from Illinois has said. This is a very important matter and one to which the committee gave very careful consideration. It is a very technical matter, and I believe it ought to have further consideration when it comes up properly in the reading of the bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will not the gentleman make a unanimous-consent request to that effect?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not in control of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. I did not hear the gentleman's suggestion. Mr. CHINDBLOM. I suggested that in the consideration of this paragraph the amendment be considered as

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman | pending and disposition of the matter be deferred until we reach section 131.

Mr. CRISP. I shall ask that that be done.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] agreed that this would be the orderly pro-

Mr. CRISP. Do I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] objects to that?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if this is only a cross reference the House is not to blame. The bill provides the exemption on page 36 and the meat or the substance of the matter is on page 103. We have started this discussion, and if we knock this outand in all liklihood we shall-when we reach page 103 I apprehend it will not be so painful.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, this bill is full of cross references. A bill of this kind, which is a general law for the benefit of those who desire to use it, very properly shows where the various matters are contained. It would not be proper at this point to have inserted all of the provisions of section 131. It is simply in the interest of orderly procedure. When we have disposed of section 131 we may find it necessary, in order to make the bill orderly, to have some reference here to that part of the bill. We have often had complaint, I will say, that our legislation is of such a character that people reading it do not know where to find things, and this arrangement was not made by the committee itself but by the experts who prepared the bill. It is for the benefit of those who will have to use the law in determining what it is and in making reference to it hereafter. As far as I am concerned, I am ready to go ahead with the subject matter, but a point of order might very well be made that all discussion as to section 131 is now out of order, since the only question is whether the paragraph, which is a cross reference, shall remain in the bill at this point.

Mr. CRISP. Gentlemen of the committee, let us consider this matter in terms of good humor. There is a difference of opinion among us, but that is no reason for not considering the bill in an orderly and decorous manner.

We have entered into this discussion of this matter based on this section, and I think that brings the whole matter before the House, and it might as well be settled now as at any other time.

The House knows the whole purport of the amendment, the House knows that this section is simply a cross-reference, and if stricken out that will indicate what will be done with section 131 when it is reached. I see no reason for the matter going over.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the

I am most heartily in favor of the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] to strike this section from the bill. However innocent it may seem, however just the policy may seem, it is productive of one of the most iniquitous systems, one of the most vicious economic systems, on the face of this earth to-day, as far as the American people are concerned. [Applause.]

What does it do? They say that it will give the people who erect plants and factories in foreign countries equal treatment with the American citizen. It is well known that to-day various large corporations and wealthy individuals are moving their factories to foreign countries, and placing their plants under foreign flags. What is the result? They employ cheap foreign labor instead of American labor, while our labor is unemployed. They are making articles in competition with American manufacturers and competing with us in every foreign country.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes. Mr. ALDRICH. And they are also using great quantities of American raw materials.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; that ought to be used in this country to give American labor employment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the gentleman yield again? Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. I believe it will have a serious effect on foreign trade. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we are selling $400,000,000 worth of cotton abroad, and you men from the cotton-growing States of the South ought to take that into consideration.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, that argument has no bearing of any value. The people of the world will have to be clothed, and they will have to be fed. Now, let me get back to the point.

They say they are paying income taxes just the same. Foreign countries are granting concessions and rebates to American capital to come to foreign countries and place their plants there, while to-day the labor in your States are walking the streets without employment. I am told that Henry Ford has a plant in Russia. He is giving employment to Russians and manufacturing tractors for the Russians to use to raise wheat in competition with the wheat growers in the West. Does any one suppose that Henry Ford is going to become a citizen of Russia if this amendment is adopted? When a disturbance occurs, then these people appeal to the United States Government to send the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps to protect them. If they are not satisfied to pay income taxes here, if they want to move to a foreign country, let them domicile their enterprises in Russia, and then when the riot comes they can appeal to Stalin and his forces. We have the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps at present in the Orient. Do you know why they are there?

We could have had all of our Americans out of China long ago. They are there to protect the Standard Oil Co. and other large corporations that have their investments in the Orient and are employing cheap labor. Does anyone think that John D. Rockefeller would move his domicile to China if we passed this amendment? No; they go where they can get concessions, where they can get cheap land, where they can get cheap labor, and whenever they get into trouble they demand that we send the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps to protect them.

The other day they had a riot in Ford's plant in Detroit. As the gentleman from Illinois said, they are shipping tractors in here, manufactured under the Ford name, by the Ford Co. in foreign countries and working foreign labor while our people are pleading for work.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the few points on which I found myself in unhappy difference with the majority of the committee. The entire question presented in this matter is one of public policy. The fiscal dimensions of the subject as described to us were of about these proportions. It was said that some $40,000,000 on the whole, in normal times, were lost to the Treasury under this provision. The committee found a way to save some $10,000,000 of the $40,000,000 so that a loss of about $30,000,000 in normal times is represented in this question of policy. I shall have to ask your pardon for resorting to one concrete illustration. An American corporation does business in an American State. It has a gross revenue of $100,000, $10,000 of which represents taxes paid to that State. It has a net revenue of $10,000 upon which it is asked to pay the 12 per cent income corporation tax.

Another American corporation does business in a foreign country that is imposing, we will say, a 12 per cent tax. It, too, has $100,000 gross income, $10,000 of which has been paid to the foreign government for the protection accorded it, in the form of an income tax. It, too, has $10,000 of net revenue, when it comes to report to our Treasury as one of our nationals doing business abroad. In the case of the American corporation with its $10,000 net, it paid some $1,200 taxes, and in the case of the corporation doing business abroad, the whole $10,000 is exempted, in consideration of the tax it has paid abroad. The aggregate of such exemptions in normal times is $30,000,000. The question of policy presented in the committee was this: Should the American Government pay this $30,000,000 bounty to our nationals doing business abroad; should we engage in such a subsidy policy?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do other countries, England, for instance, levy a tax on American money or earnings over there?

Mr. LEWIS. The only country which grants this kind of exemption to its nationals is Italy. In Canada and in Holland the exemption is granted only if the country of the national's location grants like exemptions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. In order to remove that situation, would it not be fairer to allow the American corporation to use as a credit against the tax, the taxes it pays in the States? You would then arrive at the same situation.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman and I differ fundamentally; we differ as the light differs from the darkness. My guiding star is "Equal and exact justice to all men, special privilege to none." I do not think we are justified in paying these bounties to our nationals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. It is true that these nationals argue that the taxes, if collected here, amount to double taxation. The same argument can be made by the home corporation, but if there is double taxation, there is also accorded a double protection of government at more than double the cost. Who can say how greatly reduced our naval expenditures might be if we had not to follow these nationals all over the earth in their profit-seeking adventures? [Applause.] Follow our missionaries, follow our teachers, yea, follow our treaty rights and obligations wherever they may lead us. Yes; but why should we exempt from taxation the American, who, not satisfied with the profits he can make at home, demands that the flag shall follow him with its protection into foreign lands and then, on top of that, asks an exemption on the profits he may realize. It is a difference of principle that is suggested here. I am finding-and it gives me much concern, too—as I move around in our labors here, that the white ants of special privilege are eating away the conscience and the maxims of government bit by bit until little of the ideals and government of our fathers remain to us. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, the committee change in this paragraph will bring us about $11,000,000. Of course there have been many extraneous subjects introduced into the discussion by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Rankin] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson], and I am just sick and tired, and I know the people and the country are sick and tired of hearing about the difficulties the importers have in scaling this so-called insurmountable tariff wall in this country and preventing business going on here, and the constant reference to the great exodus of American capital and American manufacturers to other countries because of the tariff wall in this country, and the bugaboo of retaliatory tariffs.

The New York Times interviewed a leading Canadian industrialist by the name of Mr. C. R. Howard recently, and he gave these facts about the movement of American industrial plants behind the Canadian tariff wall:

The departure of American plants to Canada is nothing new. It has been going on for a great many years and, remarkable to say, that in 1919, 200 branch and affiliated plants were established in Canada, and a year later the total was 700.

Whose tariff bill was in effect then? Was that because of the high tariff in this country? That was when the tariff bill the Democrats wrote in 1913—the Underwood-Simmons bill—was the law on the statute books, and Canada had no so-called retaliatory tariff.

In the next year—1920—two and one-half years before the much-abused Fordney bill became law, Mr. Howard said:

In the next year-1920-this jumped to 1,200 American branch plants in Canada.

Two hundred in 1919 and a thousand more at the end of 1920.

Not under the unconscionable rates of the Hawley-Smoot bill but under the Underwood-Simmons bill, in which the gentleman from Alabama, the late departed Congressman Underwood, said that there was no protection; not an ounce. When his attention was called to several items, he hedged a little and said, "If it contained any protection it was purely incidental."

My friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] storms and rages on the floor about the international bankers and their interference in the settlement of the debts of this country and the selling of their securities. But, oh, my friend, when the international bankers joined you and the importers to repeal the tariff law, oh, you put your arms around them and you loved the international bankers. [Applause.] You say, "Oh, Mr. International Banker, how I hated you on last Friday, but to-day I love you. You are my brother and my friend, for you are against the tariff." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CROWTHER. I have only a minute left.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, if some of you hate the excise tax, do not fight other sections of the bill that have real merit. Let us have the benefit of your good judgment rather than a manifestation of your prejudice.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. White as a substitute for the Johnson amendment: Page 36, line 6, after the word "States," insert except upon profits from manufacturing and productive enterprises other than those engaged in producing raw materials used but not adequately produced in the United States or possessions."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, it has seemed to me there has been a lack of discrimination between the conflicting interests in the matter now before the House.

We have, on the one hand, American manufacturers who have gone abroad and invested their capital in subsidiaries and are returning goods to compete with American-produced goods. My understanding of the previous amendment is that it is intended to remove the benefits of the provisions in the bill from those companies. On the other hand, we have abroad American companies' subsidiaries which are selling goods produced in American factories and by American farmers and by American labor; and if we remove the provision in the bill at the present time, as is suggested in the previous amendment, we will seriously damage them. In order to leave those people their benefits and remove the benefits from factories which have gone abroad, I have submitted this substitute amendment.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman state his amendment again?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk again report the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the substitute amendment offered by Mr. WHITE.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman in his amendment except the producers of raw materials abroad?

Mr. WHITE. Raw materials, if used in the United States and if not adequately produced in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITE, I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would that apply to rubber brought here to be used in making tires, or something like that?

Mr. WHITE. It would not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would it apply to the balloon tire made in England and shipped here?

Mr. WHITE. It would.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Made with American capital but not shipped here, but sold in England; would it apply that way?

Mr. WHITE. It would not.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. Would that apply to jute imported from India to this country?

Mr. WHITE. I believe it would penalize its competition with American goods. It is so intended.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I wish the gentleman would give an illustration of the application of his proposal, I think that will clarify his proposal.

Mr. WHITE. Such American factories as have gone abroad to manufacture goods similar to those they manufacture in the United States, with the expectation not only of escaping the tariff walls of those countries but of returning goods to the United States to compete with goods produced in this country, would be penalized under my amendment. They would not be free of the tax as exempted under the section now in the bill. If they made profits in that way, they would not be free from this provision. On the other hand, if raw material were brought from foreign countries to be used in American factories in competition with raw materials adequately produced in the United States, they would then not get these benefits.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one additional

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. What about the case of an American company that is compelled to go to some foreign country to secure the products of that country, for example, fruits, bananas, and so forth, which are not grown in the United They grow them in South American countries, and some of them are brought into the United States, while others are sent to foreign markets.

Mr. WHITE. They would receive the benefits on goods of that kind coming into the country and not in competition with adequately produced goods in this country.

Mr. McCORMACK. But they are both the raw and finished products. Would the gentleman's amendment protect a corporation which exported bananas, for instance, to some other country?

Mr. WHITE. Yes. They would not come in competition with anything adequately produced in this country, and in that way you would be aiding Americans who are engaged in business abroad and not competing seriously with Americans.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and particularly to reply to the attack of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]. In the first place, I think any man violates the proprieties of this House who gets on the floor and attacks a Member and then refuses to yield to him.

But aside from that I want to answer what little argument he made. Every time he gets up he gets excited over the tariff-and no wonder. He has excitement coming to him. The tariff he referred to has wrecked us and provoked these foreign tariff walls, so that American capital is now being required to build its plants in foreign countries, employ foreign labor, and leave our labor to walk the streets. I will admit that this iniquitous Fordney-McCumber tariff bill and this Hawley-Smoot bill did more to provoke that retaliation than everything else put together. But the wall I was referring to was the foreign tariff wall that other countries have erected against us.

Now, let me show the evils of this White amendment. The gentleman refers to raw materials. Those who want to get raw materials cheaper than they can get them from the American people are willing to protect the manufacturers to the extent of an embargo, but they ask you to permit people to go to Egypt and raise long staple cotton in competition with the people of Arkansas, Mississippi, and other Southern States.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. That is specifically excluded in my amend-

Mr. RANKIN. I understand. I asked the gentleman if it would protect the producers of raw materials in foreign countries, and my understanding is he said it would. Now, if a man goes to Russia to raise wheat, or if he goes to Egypt to raise cotton or to some South American country to get fruits, he will come in competition with things that are produced in this country. He will come in competition with the cotton of the South, the wheat of the West, or the fruits of California and of Florida. Now, if a man does that, he ought to pay this income tax. He is employing foreign labor when he could get labor in Mississippi, Florida, or California, or other States.

These companies are operating distribution plants abroad, and there is the "slant" of the big industrialists—they are not only shipping goods into this country and to foreign countries from their plants abroad, but they are employing labor there which should be employed here. If such distributing plants were located in your communities in this country they would add a great deal to the welfare of such communities. However, they are invariably employing foreign labor, foreign bookkeepers, foreign merchants, and foreign men in every walk and avocation of life.

We are simply encouraging these men of large fortunes to go beyond the boundaries of the United States, and for one I can not go with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio in the adoption of this substitute. I believe this is a just amendment, and I hope that the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] will be voted down and that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] will be adopted.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Members to the fact that this provision was written into the statute books back in 1918 by our friends, the Democrats, under section 22 (a) (1) (2) of that act, which says:

In the case of a citizen of the United States the amount of any income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes paid during the taxable year to any foreign country upon income derived from sources therein or to any possession of the United States, and in the case of a resident of the United States the amount of any such taxes paid during the taxable year to any possession of the United

So that the Democratic Party wrote this in the law back in 1918, and it has been carried there ever since.

I have sympathy for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE]. The gentleman spoke of it in a negative way, and I want to try to bring it out in a positive way.

I am not so much in sympathy with the manufacturers who put their money abroad, in France and other countries, and manufacture goods to come back here and compete with our own manufacturers, but there is another principle involved in this matter, and that is the manufacturer in the United States who starts to fabricate an article, does not complete it, but ships it to a near-by or foreign country and then begins to fabricate in the finished form the article for sale in that country.

We do an international business in this world, and on account of the tariff restrictions in various countries it is very important to start the work on some of these products and ship it as partly manufactured goods into Canada and | credited. Now, in response to a query made by the gentle-various other countries to be sold in those countries, and not to come back here to compete with our own American labor.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOHNSON] should pass, we will stop industry from doing this very thing, and industry that is employing our own men in the early stages of production of certain articles and then sending them to a foreign country to be fabricated, finished, and sold in that country.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand, the gentleman is opposed to the White amendment?

Mr. GOSS. I think the White amendment will do the very thing I am talking about, only it is put in a negative

Mr. RANKIN. Then the gentleman is not for the White substitute?

Mr. GOSS. I am for the White amendment which is before the committee, because it covers the point I am bringing out now with respect to American-made goods to be sold in foreign countries, as well as foreign goods for shipment to this country.

Mr. RANKIN. Then may I ask the gentleman a further question? If we produced the finished product here, that would give more Americans work than is given when we simply start the product and send it to some other country to be finished.

Mr. GOSS. That would be true except for the fact that on account of these retaliatory tariffs in many instances you can not have the American goods made here, and that would force the American manufacturer to go to a foreign country, if he were selling an unfinished article, and make it entirely in that country for sale there, provided the paragraph is stricken from the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. I am sure the gentleman is aware of the fact that certain foreign manufacturers attempted to get by the American tariff in that same way.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. And the Ways and Means Committee changed the tariff law last year to meet that situation. Does not the gentleman realize that if we were to make an exception such as he is asking for, it would only be a short time until foreign countries would do exactly what we have done, and even extend their retaliation and cut off these unfinished products?

Mr. GOSS. No. I will say to the gentleman that I favor the law as it is written in this bill, but if we can not get that provision through as written, I would favor the White amendment just to take care of this situation. I do not think any gentleman here wants to put American workmen out of work who are working on partially manufactured goods to be sent to some foreign country to be finished and sold there, and not to come back here and compete, and if we do not vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, then we shall regret our action.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, let us not make this matter involved, difficult, or complicated, as income-tax lawyers are wont to do.

Now, then, some discussion has arisen whether this paragraph is simply a reference to section 131, and whether it is legislation. It does legislate. The section reads:

The amount of income, war profits, and excess profits taxes imposed by foreign countries or possessions of the United States shall be allowed as a credit against the tax to the extent provided in section 131.

If that is not legislation, I do not know what is. So, that it is more than a cross reference. When you turn to page 103 or section 131, you will find there the provision:

If the taxpayer signifies-

And, of course, he will signify-in his return his desire to have the benefits of this section, the tax imposed by this title shall be credited with-

And the various provisions follow.

But, gentlemen, please note that the tax is going to be man from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] we find what? That it is an exemption given as a matter of grace; that is all; there is no right acquired. This bill is a bill to do what? To raise revenue. Gentlemen, we are going to raise revenue; here is one way of doing it. [Applause.]

It has been estimated that if this provision is stricken out, we will raise additional revenue to the extent of $35,- 000,000 in normal years.

Now, take the case—I think it was pointed out by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack]—of a fruit company growing fruit in a foreign country, but it makes its money in the United States. Therefore, the tax it pays to the foreign country is nothing but part of an overhead, and should be deducted from the gross income and not from the tax. [Applause.]

It has been stated that there was no reciprocal arrangement with other countries except one. That does not concern us at this time. We have been confronted with the suggestion that some of these people will close their plants here and go abroad.

Well, if there is any such person who, having made his money in this country, threatens the American Congress to do that, then we are well rid of that type of citizen. [Applause.]

Now, under any arrangement, the man who is manufacturing abroad surely has no complaint if you deduct his tax from the gross income and not from the tax. If by American ingenuity and skill of American workmen they build up their business in this country, and then go into a foreign country and establish a plant there, surely they can not expect to be subsidized to the extent heretofore granted. Many such undertakings in foreign countries have gotten us into serious trouble.

Mr. RANKIN. That applies to oil companies.

Mr. Laguardia. Absolutely; you remember Socony Hill, not very long ago. I think the gentleman from Maryland pointed out that matter.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. If section 131 is stricken out, I am fearful it is going to work a hardship on international business, of American interests particularly, manufacturing goods in those countries, and not coming back here. Can the gentleman give us any further light on that?

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the gentleman's argument is absolutely sound. I was going to address the committee from a different angle.

I have listened to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. Here we are, 435 Members of the House of Representatives, elected by the people to represent them, and we are controlled by mob psychology-controlled by two men on both sides of the House who have no regard for property rights, who have no regard for the individualistic theory of government and of business endeavor, who say that business has no place under our form of government. All I have listened to here is an argument against business. They do not seem to realize that the workers must depend upon the existence of business in order to live. I appreciate the sincerity of the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing], and I do not refer to him offensively, but he made a fatal mistake yesterday when he offered an amendment, which was adopted, and which in a period of depression amounts to a confiscation of property, and which is nothing but the operation of the theories of the soviet or collective government. If you want to regulate the concentration of wealth from a social angle-and the gentleman and I could harmonize and agree in principle-do it at the time of death; do not let us destroy individualism by imposing prohibitive taxes which during life will destroy individual initiative. Here we have the Democratic Party being led by a Republican! I suggest that the members of the Democratic Party should awaken to the realization of what is happening. Throughout the country the statement has gone forth that the great Democratic Party is being led by a member of the Republican Party.

Let us sit back a moment and realize just what is happening; at least, let us have respect for ourselves.

The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] meets the problem, meets all objections. I have no disagreement with the amendment offered. It provides that American capital exported abroad, creating business in competition with American business, shall be taxed and shall not be entitled to use taxes paid to a foreign government as a credit. but as a deduction. In other words, he says that American capital can go abroad, buy its raw materials, bring them into the United States and fabricate or put same into a finished form, but it can not finish the product abroad and then compete with American manufacturers in foreign markets or our home markets. That in substance is the amendment as I understand it, and I shall vote for it. It is rational, it is logical. We do not want the people of our country to feel that the Members of the House of Representatives favor legislation that is destructive of not only the existence of business but of the individualistic theory of civilization that we enjoy. At least let it be known that there are some Members of this body who are trying to look at this question rationally and who realize that when we destroy business we in turn destroy the opportunity of employment to our workers. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of clarifying the amendment, I ask unanimous consent to change it to read as a perfecting amendment instead of a substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as a perfecting amendment instead of as a substitute.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM and others rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is going to be the disposition in respect to recognizing Members in speaking on the various amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes members of the committee first. That rule has always been followed.

Mr. BOYLAN. I ask the chairman what the rule is going

Mr. BOYLAN. I ask the chairman what the rule is going to be, whether a certain group of men are going to get recognition all the time and no one else will be recognized? If that is so, the rest of us might as well leave the Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can use his own discretion about that. The Chair will follow the rules of the House and will recognize the gentleman whenever conditions are such that he can. He will recognize first members of the committee.

Mr. BOYLAN. Very true; but under the rules of the House, when a gentleman has been once recognized he should not be recognized again upon the same amendment if some one else desires to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a different amendment. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the voice of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] a moment ago was like a cry in the wilderness. It had been my purpose to ask the same question practically that he propounded. How long will the membership of this House continue in its apparently avowed purpose to destroy the business of the United States? How long shall we use the power of taxation to destroy? We have started out in a way that is going to make it unprofitable for people in the United States to employ their money in business. We are driving capital into tax-exempt securities, we are driving capital into every sort of investment except that of profitable employment for the people of the United States. Investment in industry is always hazardous and investment in business is hazardous. Returns are uncertain. If a man puts his money in industry and gives employment to others he is taking a large chance of any returns for himself. Conditions may come just as they are now, when he has no profits, when he is unable to obtain any return upon his capital, and then the only recourse for him, if we are going to confiscate his earnings, is to put his money in tax-exempt securities.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not now. I said a moment ago, and the discussion proves it, that this paragraph should have been held over until we reach section 131. Briefly, the entire question, as proposed by the bill, is this: If a man has an investment in the United States, in Great Britain, and in the Argentine, and he makes a profit in the United States, in Great Britain, and in the Argentine, the Government of the United States taxes him on his entire profit. Assume that he has a profit of $100,000 in the United States, $100,000 in Great Britain, and $100,000 in the Argentine; we tax him 13 per cent on the entire amount of $300,000-or $39,000. But he has been compelled to pay a tax upon $100,000 that were earned entirely in Great Britain, not one dollar of which was earned in the United States. He has been compelled to pay, under the present law in Great Britain, as I recall it, 25 per cent-or $25,000. We give him a credit to the extent of $13,000 which, by a system of bookkeeping, we have already charged against him in the United States, under our income-tax laws. He pays no income tax in Argentina. He gets no credit upon his earnings in Argentina, although every dollar of it was earned in the Argentine. We collect from him $13,000 for taxes on the money which he earned in Argentina, because he happens to be a citizen and resident of the United States. Is there anything wrong about that? Is there anything unfair about that? A man who is subject to taxation in a foreign country in which he lives, in which he does business, in which he earns every dollar of his profit, is simply given credit for the amount of taxes he pays to the foreign country, upon the amount of business which is done there, every cent of which is earned in a foreign country and not one penny of which is earned in the United States.

I think when we come to understand this section, when we come to section 131, we can act intelligently upon it, and we can then determine just what we want to do with it. I say that this particular paragraph has reference to section 131, and when we get to section 131 we can say what credits are to be allowed on taxes paid, but there is no necessity of putting these matters in here.

Of course, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, inasmuch as the committee has taken up the question at this point, but the orderly procedure, I insist, would be to offer such amendments when we come to section 131.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all alarmed by the tirade made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack]. I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Chindblom], when you charge us to-day with attempting to destroy business, you by your policy have already destroyed business. [Applause.]

Since 1922, when I happened by the good fortune of the votes of the people in my district to become a Member of Congress, I have listened to the arguments on various revenue bills that have been before the House. I have listened to the same argument, the same stock in trade, at every session of Congress in which I have been a Member.

Talk about driving the revenues of the country into taxfree securities! You have talked that for 12 years, and the country knows your predictions have not come true.

Mr. Chairman, I am for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] without change. It is an amendment of merit. My observation in this House has always been that when a meritorious amendment, upon which the common people and the capitalistically inclined differ, every amendment that is offered thereto is intended to destroy rather than to improve. This amendment should be adopted just as it is written. The substitute should be defeated.

I say, in face of the fact it is understood we are considering section 131 with this amendment, that I am opposed to exempting the Philippines or any other of the possessions of the United States. For years the United States, with its Army and Navy, policed Mexico for the benefit of those who had investments in that country. We lost the lives of many of our marines and spent millions of money in Morocco to protect American investments there. To-day we are protecting American investments and American citizens in China. If we could estimate the expense of this Government for the protection of investments in foreign countries. it would far exceed the benefits we have derived from such investments. In this bill we permit American citizens and corporations that invest their capital and engage in business in foreign countries to virtually escape taxation at home by deducting taxes paid in foreign countries from taxes due this country. Yet when we try to remove this discrimination between investments at home and in investments abroad we are charged with being unpatriotic. If we are to discriminate, let it be in favor of the man who engages in business at home and employs American labor. That is more in keeping with my kind of patriotism.

They talk about destroying business. As I said to the gentleman from Illinois, you have already destroyed business in this country. Not only that, but with the destruction of business in America you have destroyed the common people. You have filled the poorhouses and asylums with the poverty stricken and insane. You have marked your trail with the red blood and dead body of the suicide. That is the history of the policy that the gentleman from Illinois seeks to follow. [Applause.]

I think the time has come for the parting of the ways. I think the time has come when we should have a humanitarian policy as well as a financial policy. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] may undertake to proscribe me. I say if the Democratic Party takes the position that is occupied by the Republican Party, and places money above humanity, then I will no longer be a Democrat. [Applause.]

The gentleman a moment ago referred to the fact that the provision which the pending amendment seeks to remove was written into the revenue legislation back in 1922 by the Democrats. Well, that is just an illustration of the fact that if we have somebody in the Democratic Party who becomes so far commercialized that he could write something a little more favorable to special interests than the Republicans had, you are ready to take it up and follow it to the end. I do not happen to be that kind of a Democrat. I believe in a tax bill that is just and fair. I believe in a tax bill that places the burden of taxation upon the people in proportion to their ability to pay.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that if this revenue bill fails to pass the Government will sink. I do not believe that if the Budget fails to be balanced at this time the entire Government will sink. I do not believe that if a sales tax is imposed the American people will be entirely annihilated. However, I strongly oppose the sales tax. I do not believe that industry will be completely destroyed if some of these gentlemen who have investments abroad are taxed or not taxed. I do not believe, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, that a Republican is leading all of the Democrats who are opposed to a sales tax; neither do I believe that Mr. Mellon is leading all Democrats who are in favor of a sales tax. In fact, I do not believe that party affairs are entirely dominating the situation as it now is. But I do believe that in the great turmoil in which our country finds itself some of our sanest statesmen are becoming a little bit too greatly alarmed about the revenue bill and legislation in general. It is now a time for us to be calm, sane, and thoughtful, forget our differences, and legislate for the best interest of the great majority of the American people.

It occurs to me, my friends, that there should have been a greater alarm when the Congress was imposing the deficit on the Treasury by such appropriations as $500,000 a mile for a road from here to Mount Vernon. It is a magnificent highway and was needed, but not to the extent of its cost and a Treasury deficit. Also by such appropriations as $17,000,000 for a Department of Commerce Building and several thousand dollars there for a private elevator, whereby the Secretary of that department, a member of the Hoover millionaire cabinet, may go to his luxurious private offices without being disturbed by the turmoil of the common | for more taxes? It is time to call a halt and retrench and people. Yes, my friends, why should my people be sales taxed to uphold such unnecessary, princely, and lordly luxury?

It seems to me that some of our good friends who are now so alarmed at the deficit in the Treasury and so alarmed about balancing the Budget should have been a little more sane than they were when $7,000,000 was appropriated by their vote in order that Congressmen might have more comfortable quarters. It seems to me at that time you could have looked into the future and have seen a little bit of the chaotic conditions which now confront us. Yes, my friends, when you Republicans fostered, voted for, and passed appropriations for millions of dollars to build magnificent mansions in foreign countries to house our diplomats; yes, and when you voted to so nearly cancel debts owed our Nation by foreign nations; yes, and when you very recently voted for moratorium of foreign debts you know it was the first step toward full cancellation. Yes, you have thus largely brought about the huge deficit in the Treasury and now call upon me to vote a sales tax on my people to make it good. Gentlemen, I refuse to do it.

When the proper place in the bill is reached I shall offer an amendment to eliminate from the provisions of the sales tax containers of fruits and vegetables, as you know Florida is a large shipper of fruits and vegetables. These growers are now, very many of them, producing and shipping at a loss. They can not pay further tax on containers; it would be unfair, unjust, and even impossible, because often they do not get enough returns to pay for the containers at the present price. I shall probably offer other amendments for exemptions where my constituents are particularly interested. In fact, gentlemen, the proposed sales tax in its entirety is the most unjust and unfair avenue of taxation now facing the American people. Are you going to force it upon our weak and defenseless people? You never will through my vote. [Applause.]

I believe, my friends, that about 90 per cent of our people have only 10 per cent of the wealth of our country. I believe that about 80 per cent of the wealth of our country is in the hands of 4 per cent of our people. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Chindblom] are so alarmed for fear business and business men may be destroyed through taxation. So this 90 per cent of our people with only 10 per cent of the wealth will bear 90 per cent of the sales tax that some of the gentlemen in this Chamber would force upon them.

It seems to me it is time for the strong arm of our great Government to reach out once more to the common, plain, poor people of our land, rather than to further exploit them through a sales tax. [Applause.]

Rather than impose additional taxes upon the American people I say we should retrench in Government expenditures. The Budget could be reduced by approximately one-third. Bureau after bureau have been set up to tax and sap the American public. Why in the last 20 years department employees have grown to an alarming extent. The number in the Department of Commerce have leaped from 8,788 to 23,680; those of the Interior Department from 18,904 to 19,777; the number in the Department of Agriculture have grown from 15,420 to 28,175. This is Secretary Hyde's department; are you surprised that he is the politician of the Hoover millionaire cabinet? In politics he is a past master and is the big political brain of the great trio-Hoover, Hurley, and Hyde.

Expenditures for the departments have increased during the past 20 years to an astonishing degree. The Department of Agriculture has increased fifteen times, from $19,000,000 to $296,000,000. That of independent offices from $166,500,000 to $1,306,000,000. Department of Commerce has grown from $15,000,000 to well over $61,000,000. Department of Justice from $9,000,000 to $44,800,000. The Post Office Department expenditures have increased over $145,000,000 in the past 20 years. The Treasury Department from $122,000,000 to $1,346,800,000. The War Department from $187,000,000 to $489,000,000, and the other departments have also increased. Now, are you surprised at deficit and taxes and necessity for more than a century has vigorously opposed. I wish practice economy and spend less Government money recklessly. Cut department expenditures, cut our own salaries, yes, by 25 or even 50 per cent. I am ready to vote for these reductions now. I am ready to vote against the sales tax. and I hope you gentlemen will join with me and truly represent the burdened people of the country, who are looking to us for relief instead of more taxes and greater burdens. I have seen the man of small wages go into the grocery store and into the dry-goods stores and buy the cheapest possible for himself and his family and then throw it across his shoulder and walk out and on to his home. Now, are we going to make this man pay more for the groceries that he lugs home on his shoulder? You will never do it by my vote. He is unable to send his lobbyist and representatives here to appear in fine clothes before your committees and plead his cause, as is the rich, but for him, my colleagues, I am speaking. He is a useful and necessary American citizen, and in his cause and in the cause of the common, plain people my ark covenant is launched and I shall continue to protest additional burdens for him to carry. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague, Mr. Johnson of Missouri. It should be adopted. Some opponents of this amendment have been very violent in their denunciation of this amendment and in criticism of those of us who oppose the sales tax. They have even challenged the Democracy, sincerity, and patriotism of those of us who believe that the sales tax is un-Democratic, un-Republican, and un-American. I resent such methods. The time has gone by in this body when any Member by resorting to strong-arm methods can intimidate or control the vote of the membership of this House or force the adoption of vicious legislation. I yield to no man in my respect for the sincerity of my colleagues. I do not at any time question the Democracy and patriotism of those who sit on the Democratic side of this aisle, but I do deny to any man the prerogative of sitting in judgment upon my Democracy, my patriotism, or my sincerity. I believe I know what constitutes Democracy. For more than half a century I have been a diligent though perhaps an inept student of the philosophy of Democracy. I am not unfamiliar with its glorious achievements, the record of which is the history of our country's greatness. I believe I understand the principles which underlie, permeate, and vitalize the Democratic Party, and I will not stand mute or remain silent when any man directly or by innuendo questions my patriotism or party loyalty.

The gentleman from Massachusetts tauntingly charges that Democrats in this House are following the leadership of a Republican, the gentleman from New York [Mr. La-GUARDIA]. This revenue bill is not a party matter. Democrats and Republicans are supporting it. Other Democrats and other Republicans are opposing many of its provisions. The men who wrote this bill were never commissioned by the Democratic Party or by the Democratic membership of this House to commit our great party in favor of a sales tax, which has been specifically condemned in a national Democratic platform and which from the time of Thomas Jefferson has been considered undemocratic and fundamentally unsound.

May I say frankly and without passion that whenever I am called upon to vote in this House on a proposition which is championed by a Republican, if deep down in my heart I believe that proposition is just and right and will conserve and promote the welfare of my country, I, as a Democrat, will support it, notwithstanding the source from which it comes. [Applause.]

If a Democratic principle and policy is advocated by a Republican, is that any reason why I should oppose the proposition? While the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIAl is a Republican, he is standing on a Democrat platform when he opposes a sales tax, and he is helping us fight the battles of democracy and tear out of this bill a provision embodying a policy that Thomas Jefferson denounced as un-American and which the Democratic Party there were more Republicans on the other side of the aisle who would accept Democratic principles and policies. I am supporting the program of Mr. LaGuardia in opposition to sales tax, not because he is a Republican but because he is fighting for a Democratic principle and policy and he is championing the cause of the common people, whose interests are ruthlessly betrayed if this sales-tax provision becomes a law. Mr. LaGuardia did not create the opposition to the sales tax. He and others, most of them Democrats, are merely directing the opposition to this vicious proposal.

Now, the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] announces a sound and wise public policy. Its adoption will materially increase our revenue from profits on American capital invested abroad. I think profits on capital invested abroad should be taxed higher than profits invested in mills and factories in the United States. Many manufacturers who have grown enormously rich because of our high tariff policy have taken large sums of money into Canada and other foreign countries and invested it in manufacturing plants, where they can get the benefit of cheap labor, which enables them to sell their foreign-made products in the United States in competition with commodities made in American factories, and also the products of these foreign factories are sent into the markets of the world to compete with the products of our American factories.

So we are in effect financing industry in foreign lands, thereby enabling them to take from us a market for our own products. The amendment is not unjust to American capitalists who have invested their funds in foreign lands. It merely requires them to pay the United States a tax on the profits made in these foreign factories, and does not allow a deduction from such profits of the sums paid as taxes to foreign nations.

It is simply a question of whether we are going to be more liberal in taxing profits earned in foreign lands than in taxing the profits made in American industries. This amendment merely requires that the same tax be paid on all the profits, whether made at home or abroad.

Henry Ford moved his tractor factory to Ireland and thereby deprived 7,000 American workmen of employment. Under the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill Ford is permitted to ship his tractors into the United States without paying a tariff on them. In paying income taxes to Uncle Sam Ford should account for all his profits in foreign lands without deducting taxes he pays on his foreign plants to foreign nations.

Many of the greatest wars in history grew out of a struggle for trade and commerce. The American Revolution grew out of an effort on the part of the British Board of Trade to monopolize the American markets. The London merchants did infinitely more to precipitate the Revolution than Lord North, Lord Granville, George III, and the Tory cabinets. The Trojan War, immortalized by the blind Homer, was more the result of trade rivalries than a struggle for the fair, faithless, and false Helen. The great World War had its real origin in a struggle for commercial supremacy, and while I am not disposed to do anything that will injure legitimate business, I am nevertheless for the American manufacturer in preference to the foreign manufacturer. Rather than favor the one manufacturer who invests his capital abroad, I would favor the nine manufacturers whose capital is invested in the United States, who employ American labor, and whose interests and welfare are inseparably bound up with the people of the United States.

In December, 1924, and in January, February, and March, 1925, on the floor of this House and in extension in seven speeches I called attention to the mistakes American capitalists were making in lending and investing tremendous sums of American money abroad. For example, I showed that $40,000,000 of American capital was sent to France to improve the Lyons-Paris Railroad, frequently referred to as the Pennsylvania Railroad of France, and that $30,000,000 was loaned to rehabilitate the railroad from Paris to Lorraine. And that not only hundreds of millions but more than $9,000,000,000 had at that time been loaned to foreign Provinces, foreign municipalities, foreign railroads, foreign utility companies, and foreign manufacturing companies. I showed at that time we were financing our competitors, rehabilitating the industrial plants of Europe, lending them the capital with which to rebuild and improve their factories, and then go out and recapture the markets of the world, which we had taken during and following the World War. That is just exactly what happened and what we are still doing. We are still financing our competitors in foreign nations and enabling them, with their cheap labor, to undersell us in the markets of the world.

We have something like twenty-three hundred American manufacturing plants that have foreign branches. We are, by financing these foreign factories operated by cheap labor, enabling them to send their commodities not only into foreign markets to compete with our products, but these commodities processed in American-owned foreign factories are being sent into the United States to compete with products from American factories, fabricated by American labor.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I yield.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. The real question is whether we shall favor the employer of foreign labor over the employer of American labor.

Mr. LOZIER. My friend from Missouri is correct. It is a question of whether we think more of the all-American manufacturer than we do of the manufacturer who has one plant in the United States and one or more in foreign lands. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CROSS. Mr. Chairman, this is no time for Members on either side of this Chamber to be influenced by partisan slings, and I trust that no Democrat will be influenced to vote against a good amendment because a Republican offers the amendment, and I trust that no Republican will be influenced to vote against a good amendment because a Democrat offers it. We must lay aside partisanship. We are up against doing something now that is worth while for the country. We should forget partisan politics, and I regret to see the little flings that are cast from both sides by the partisan minded. It is for the purpose of arousing you Republicans over here who are big minded and broad minded and want to work for the benefit of the whole country. [Applause.] When this is done by our men over here it is done for the purpose of arousing your partisanship and trying to make you forget reason in order to spite a Republican.

Do not let this be done. Stand up here and do your duty, use your judgment, and those who make bitter, burning speeches I advise them to wipe the froth from their lips and let reason get back on the throne and be patriots and not partisans.

I believe this is a good amendment. Nobody wants to injure business and no one wants to let big business destroy little business. I do not believe it is wise that big business should expatriate billions and billions of American dollars, the product of the brain and labor of America, and enlist it in foreign enterprises to come back here and close our American factories and put our Americans out of jobs and put them on the streets hungry and begging for bread. I say the amendment is good. I am opposed to the substitute, and trust every man here will rise up and vote from the standpoint of patriotism. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. We discussed this section 1 hour or more yesterday, and with the 20 minutes it will be 2 hours to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, we have heard three or four characteristic speeches in the last 10 or 15 minutes in which we have heard a great deal about big business and a great deal about the common people. They always remind me of the man who stands up with courage and determination and announces that virtue is better than vice and that a patriot is better than a traitor. Whom do they expect to take the opposite side of the argument? This is something we like to give to the voters back home, but the thing that surprises me is how they can come into a group of Congressmen and talk about the so-called common people and the evils of big business.

Yesterday, in my estimation, was one of the saddest days in the Congress. [Applause.] The Members of this body scuttled the ship and deserted their leaders. Who was in the saddle yesterday and who is in the saddle to-day at the range? Mr. Blanton, of Texas, Mr. Rankin, of Mississippi, Mr. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. LaGuardia, of New York.

We have left completely the leaders of the House, and the Ways and Means Committee that spent hours and days trying to figure out this tax bill.

Where are the leaders of the Democratic Party who should be here? Where is the Speaker? Where is Mr. RAINEY and where is JOE BYRNS alongside of Mr. CRISP battling here? You gentlemen know that if this were a Republican measure Nicholas Longworth would have been down here beside his leaders giving every aid to this proposition.

This is the way I look at the matter. The Ways and Means Committee on this intricate problem has spent hours and days, and they have had the benefit of the best experts we have, and along comes the House and follows somebody who has not been in the committee meetings and who has not had the benefit of any such expert advice.

There is one thing we never hear on the floor of this House. We hear men stand up and speak for the dear, common people and for the laboring man. Labor is well organized and well represented here. Capital is well organized and well represented here. Does anybody ever stand up and talk about the great middle class, the so-called white collar class, and there are millions more of them than labor and capital, and yet nobody stands up and argues for them. They are the ones that this sales tax will help.

Gentlemen, I have cast my lot, and I am proud to cast my lot with Judge Crisp, and Bert Snell, and the leaders on both sides, and I shall follow their leadership. [Ap-

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent, in-asmuch as reference has been made to me twice, that I may proceed for five minutes outside of the 20 minutes covered by the motion.

Mr. BOYLAN and Mr. SEIBERLING objected.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, since my good and able friend the Democratic from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] and some others have called for leadership on the Democratic side in opposition to the sales tax, much as I regret to assume the responsibility, I am going to attempt it in a 5-minute address.

He wanted to know how long we Democrats were going to follow this kind of a course of adding amendments to increase the income tax. We are going to follow it just as long as he and this committee and 15 or 20 other Democrats follow the Secretary of the Treasury, Ogden Mills. [Applause.]

Our leader—and in one sense he is our leader, and we respect him—is on the committee, but he is your leader in this fight. We need no leader. We have the votes, and we are going to pursue this course just as long as the committee tries to ram down the throats of the Democrats of the Nation and in this House the unjust sales tax and try to force it on the American people. [Applause.]

You know that this provision is defeated; and since you know it is defeated and you members of the Ways and Means Committee have the right to bring in a revenue measure, why do you not let us vote on it and eliminate it at once?

I am not a radical against wealth, but I am a radical in taking care of the interests of the American people. This measure is nothing else in the world but a measure in the interest of the rich of this country. Who wants it? The wealthy, Wall Street, and the bankers of this country.

Ogden Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, the spokesman of the Morgans and Wall Street, demands it. Mr. William Randolph Hearst wants it. He has spent hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars to get the law on the statute books. We decline to follow him. I had a hundred times rather follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. Laguardia] for his nerve and for his courage in defending the American people than the crowd demanding this measure. He is in no sense leading us; he is cooperating with us and deserves credit. He is not by himself; there are a large number on the Republican side that will vote the same way against this unjust sales tax.

What is the question involved here? It is whether or not we are going to tax the income of the man who made his money here in the United States, as Henry Ford has made his millions, who was never known to give much to charity, who is probably the richest man in the world, and who goes to foreign countries like Canada, Russia, Ireland, and Germany and establishes businesses there. Why should he not pay an income tax on the money he makes in foreign countries?

Now, the gentleman from Ohio, who offers a substitute, is a manufacturer. I anticipate that he has been before the committee and has been in opposition to every tax named in the bill except the sales tax. His amendment will not be adopted.

We are not so radical; we do not lead nor attempt to lead anybody. We are going to take this sales tax out of the bill, and you know it. Why not get together, you business men, instead of indulging in so much discussion; why not get down to business and settle this matter, so that it will balance or nearly balance the Budget, instead of playing politics?

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. You are charging men with the responsibility. I would like to know who you are talking about?

The responsible leadership of the House is on the gentleman's side of the aisle. If he is not in harmony with that leadership he should say so and criticize it. The Republican side of the House, as the gentleman suggests, has been following that leadership.

Mr. FULLER. Some of you Republicans want this measure passed and then lay the blame on the Democrats. If it is passed it will be by a handful of Democrats and you Republicans. I am not in harmony with the leadership on the Democratic side on the Ways and Means Committee, and neither am I in harmony with the leadership on the gentleman's side. We need no official leadership to defeat this sales tax. We on this side of the aisle represent the Democratic Party and our constituency and refuse to blindly follow any committee or leaders who we consciously believe are against the bests interests and welfare of over 90 per cent of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the British Empire sent to the Argentine Republic recently the Prince of Wales to build up British good will and trade and revive British factories. The British commercial interests made of their most distinguished royal character just a drummer boy, because Great Britain and every other country in the world realizes that it has to have foreign trade not only to flourish but to survive.

To-day we have heard here from the mouths of Members of this House hopes and expressions of a policy of "scuttle"—the scuttling of our foreign trade, which a couple of years ago, before the world collapsed, before there were 20 or 25 rebellions and revolutions in the world, was about the chief source of our prosperity.

Three hundred and thirty-five million dollars' worth of foreign gold came into my own city every year from our Detroit exports, but now foreign trade and credit have failed considerably. In 1913 one of our intelligent Cabinet members, Secretary of Commerce W. C. Redfield, and the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, realizing that Germany was spending in New York City, carrying out the Bismarck doctrine, more money to get our trade than the United States was spending all over the world, initiated the policy of getting foreign trade.

Now we have $250,000,000 of our Government money invested in loans and subsidies for the American merchant marine, and we have tremendous appropriations for commercial agencies, attachés representatives, and buildings abroad.

Just before this period of terror and depression came in this country it would have been impossible to attack, as has been attacked here on the floor of the House, the sagacious and patriotic doctrine of American trade and business. Back in Revolutionary days, and before the Civil War, the Yankee clipper ship and the Yankee drummer abroad were the things of which we were the most proud, as typical of our daring and enterprise.

Now we hear to-day that was all wrong and that we must hate and avoid foreigners and aliens for business purposes.

Appeals are made to an ignorant and ruthless spirit in America, the spirit of local isolation and provincialism. We must live and trade in this world.

It was a Democratic administration that asked the large appropriations from Congress to build up foreign trade, and to-day leading Democrats attack the promotion and protection of foreign trade.

The National City Bank competed with the Great English and German banks—in fact, their national banks—and went into the Argentine Republic and established a branch there to aid our exporters, and this bank established branches in Africa, Asia, Europe, and South America on the request of our Federal Government. The National City Bank has an agency now in Harbin, in Manchuria, and one also in Shanghai. But that was just one phase of our world-trade policy.

And what have we heard here to-day? That our American troops are in Shanghai not to protect the thousands of our innocent American men, women, and children and our missionaries and our business men and our tourists and other people and their property, but that they are there to protect the Standard Oil Co.! What an appeal to demagogy! We have heard attacked here to-day the greatest benefactor of the poor workingman and of American business, Henry Ford. Henry Ford was a poor man, a common laborer, at 40 years of age. Now he has become a rich man solely through his own ability, and now that in our hour of terror and depression it is popular to attack the rich, Mr. Ford is attacked here on this floor.

He is not afraid in these terrifying times. He is risking his entire fortune to bring back American employment, prosperity, and business, and is working like a dog personally at his advanced age.

Gentleman here to-day have even referred to the radical riot at his factory the other day, in which there was blood-shed, and have intimated he was partly responsible for it, when he is the biggest employer in the United States and is in no way responsible for hard times or for this particular riot. I do not presume to advise the House, but anybody who strikes down American foreign trade or Henry Ford, or men of his type, is striking down one of America's most vital assets and noble men, who are necessary to our revival. The big drug companies in the United States established foreign branch factories over 40 years ago; it is not wrong for American manufacturers to establish branches abroad. It is wise and helpful. The American Congress should encourage these fine Americans abroad, who, after all, take all the risks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a minute of time, as my voice will not permit me to do otherwise. A few days ago I introduced a bill (H. R. 10098) to pension the ex-slaves of America. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Te revolution in this country was started because the American people were taxed without representation and if we keep on overtaxing the American people we will have trouble again in this country. At the beginning of the great Revolutionary War the first blood was spilled for American freedom on the streets of Boston by an ex-slave. I have a table prepared showing just how many ex-slaves there are in this country, showing just where they live, in what States, and how many of them are alive, which I shall put into the extension of my remarks. I want the Members of the House to understand the situation. Since we have been talking in this country so much about old-age pensions, I think the Members of the House should know that if America owes a pension to any class of people it owes a pension to those who had their test days taken from them. I wish my voice were such that I could talk more, but it is not. I shall extend my remarks and send a copy to every Member here. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and fellow colleagues, the first great war America was ever engaged in was the War of the Revolution, between England and America, brought on by taxation without representation.

The first American citizen to take part in that war was an ex-slave named Crispus Attucks, and the field of such action was Boston, Mass., in the year 1770. Over the grave of Attucks and his three white companions, all buried in one grave, the following tribute was inscribed on the stone:

Long as freedom's cause the wise contend, Dear to your country shall your fame extend; While to the world the lettered stone shall tell Where Attucks, Caldwell, Gray, and Maverick fell.

In every other crisis in this country, including the Second War with England, with Jackson at New Orleans, were included men of my racial group who died for America. We were with Perry at Lake Erie in the same war. There were many of them who died defending the Stars and Stripes, which should never touch the ground.

In the war with Mexico they fought nobly for America. In the great Civil War they fought 200,000 strong to preserve America in one solid Union. In the Spanish-American War no troops fought more nobly than the Negro soldiers, especially at San Juan Hill.

In the great World War they were enlisted 380,000 strong and fought for world democracy. May the time come in America when every citizen shall have the right to real democracy, regardless of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

I wish to recite that during the long period of slavery, 244 years, we grew from a population of 20 brought over here in 1619 on a Dutch trading ship to 4,000,000 at the time of the Emancipation Proclamation. Of this vast number I want to say that those of my racial group were never known to be disloyal, not only to America but to the individual slave masters. None has committed treason against our Government, either in the Nation, State, or locally. Kidnaping was not known in those days. My racial group constituted the servant class and had every opportunity and some incentive for wrongdoing but were not found recreant to the trust reposed in them; and if the American people again rely on negro servants, their children will not be kidnaped and held for ransom. Kidnaping is the most horrible of all horrible crimes. Only those who are mothers and fathers can appreciate the distress, loss, and uncertainty as to the whereabouts and condition of their loved ones. Not even during the period of the Civil War, when there were those holding my group in bondage and fighting at the front to keep them in servitude, did they in any way prove disloyal. They cultivated the soil, hewed the wood, drew the water, and protected the virtue of the wives and children of those who held them in bondage. No greater loyalty can humankind show in any place in history.

Therefore I have been prompted to introduce the following bill in an effort to give recognition and do justice to those who are now living who were emancipated by the Emancipation Proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln in 1863: A bill providing for pensions for ex-slave citizens of the United States of America or its Territorial or insular possessions

Be it enacted, etc., That any ex-slave citizen of the United States, or its Territorial or insular possessions, who was freed by the Emancipation Proclamation of January 1, 1863, and who is eligible under the requirements of section 2 of this act, shall be paid a monthly pension by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in an amount which equals but does not exceed $30, when added to the monthly net income of the applicant (averaged over annual periods and included in the annual income from any personal or real property).

(c) The counsel is authorized (subject to the civil service laws and the classification act of 1923, as amended) to appoint and fix the compensation of assistants and clerks, and is authorized to make such expenditures as may be necessary for the performance of the duties vested in him.

SEC. 7. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

This bill, as you will note from its contents, provides for a pension of $30 a month to each ex-slave living who has arrived at the age of 75 years or over.

According to the Federal census taken in 1930, there are not to exceed 100,000 ex-slaves living past 75 years of age. According to actuarial departments of large insurance companies, people past 75 years of age have an average life of between six and seven years. So we could not be put to a great deal of expense in paying this pension, which would cost the American people about $3,600,000 per annum, plus administration expenses which may amount to $1,000,000, covering a period not exceeding 10 years.

I shall herein insert a table showing 118,446 negroes 75 years of age and over, of which not to exceed 100,000 are exslaves. Those of you who remember your history will know that there were about 500,000 freemen living of the Negro race when the Emancipation Proclamation was issued. This includes the total population, and therefore about 121/2 per cent, or one-eighth of them, are not ex-slaves.

I want further to call your attention to the fact that nearly all this money would, under this act, go to States lying South of the Mason and Dixon line, and that is where it should go, because the great majority of these people live there.

I also wish to insert herein a table showing how I arrive at the sum of money these people could have earned at gainful occupations if they had had an opportunity to work for a living like other American citizens. This is based upon one-half the total population. The youngsters were put to work in the fields between the ages of 10 and 12, so one-half or over must have been employed.

Beginning in the year 1619, including those brought over on the Dutch trading ship and other cargoes brought in by other ships, we presume there must have been 1,368 of them here. Increasing that at the rate of 30 per cent per 10-year period, the total will show you how they increased and what their annual salary should have been and also what the 10-year period would have been, and this is compiled on a 10-year period as that is the basis of the census. The first census we had was in 1790, wherein the slave population speaks for itself. The increase for every 10-year period amounted to between 28 and 331/3 per cent, so we find in the year 1790 there were 697,624 slaves, and prior to that time I estimate that every 10-year period the population would be reduced 30 per cent, which gives me the figures the table shows.

The total amount earned by those ex-slaves, at $50 a year, would be $3,793,758,350. At 3 per cent per annum, not compounded, for 70 years, would be 2.10 per cent, or $7,966,892,535, and a grand total, principal and interest, of $11,760,650,885.

It does appear to me that the great American people, philanthropically inclined as they are, would be justified in pensioning its ex-slaves, and take care of these poor, aged, and decrepit people who have not had an opportunity in life, thus assisting them in making their last days in a measure their best days.

You will note that one table shows how many there are living in each State who will receive benefits under this act. and just what it will cost the Government to put this law into execution, and what amount the slave could have earned if he had had the opportunity like other Americans. You will find a set-off in the table against the cost of administration of the act which will amount to less than $40,000,000, as against their estimated earning capacity, including interest, of $11,760,650,885.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement all time on this section has expired. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it would be quite possible for this House to discuss this very important bill calmly, without personal attacks, and that the discussion could be limited to the merits of the bill. This attempt to inject animosities, to create party strife, at least indicates that the proponents of the sales-tax feature have no good sound arguments to offer.

I want to say to my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack], because he is my friend, that on my first tax bill in this House I sat at the feet of Claude Kitchin, who had charge of that bill, learned from him, and I voted with him. In the Mellon plan, in the 1924 and 1926 bills, I followed John Garner. [Applause.] I have as much right to oppose the sales tax as the gentleman from Massachusetts has to advocate it. [Applause.]

Let me submit this: The bipartisan opposition to the salestax provision was made necessary by the bipartisan advocacy of that infamous provision. [Applause.]

I did not hear any criticism because the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is supporting the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp]. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] unfortunately took the floor and defended those corporations that are leaving our shores because they want to manufacture with cheap labor and exploit labor in foreign countries. They have never treated labor fairly. The gentleman from Massachusetts and I have nothing in common, I am sure, with a certain automobile manufacturer who has transported his plant to Canada and to Ireland for cheap labor and brings back tractors to this country under the free list and in competition with American labor.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say that the leadership against this sales-tax proposition was assumed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], a member of the committee, when he came here and announced to the House that he would oppose it. That is all there is to that. All this talk about defending the wealthy! Apparently they are well cared for and have been for many years by Congress. Why should we be abused and denounced for protecting and defending the rights of the workers and the wage earners? Where would these multimillionaires be if it were not for the workers? What have we been up against since we came here in December? First, after President Hoover made his tour of the Middle West and declared his position on the matter of the foreign debts, he returned to Washington, and a committee of bankers informed the President that he must declare a moratorium or else they would close their banks and create havoc; and the President did. Thereafter a committee of bankers went to the President and asked him to personally approve of the Credit Finance Corporation else a panic would follow; and the President telegraphed to leaders of both parties and called them into conference, and he approved the Credit Finance Corporation. When that went up as a bubble this same crowd came to Washington and told Congress to appropriate $2,000,000,000 and to establish the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and told us that if we did not do so, they would default on bonds and ruin every savings bank and every insurance company of the country; and Congress did. Even then they threatened a panic.

Now, did they not do that?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman while he is on the floor say what is in this letter that he secured unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD this morning?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will give the gentleman a copy.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Then they came in with more threats, and told us to pass the inflation bill, and Congress did. Now they came here and said, "Let the working people pay this deficit; pass a sales tax." And the best proof that the sales tax was forced is that there is not a gentleman who took the floor in favor of it who did not apologize for it. But this time Congress refuses to be threatened any more and will refuse.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In just a moment.

When it appeared that there was danger that the sales tax would be defeated the cry went out, "Reduce wages at once and take it out of the working people anyway."

Now, gentlemen, I submit we have a perfect right to defend that middle class and working class that some gentlemen sneeringly referred to to-day; yes, to defend the working people that the gentleman from Massachusetts, I know, wants to defend. I want to say to the gentleman, who grew eloquent for big business, that big business needs the working people a great deal more than the working people need big business. I hope that we may proceed to the orderly consideration of this bill, and, just as the appeal was made to lay aside politics in the defense of this iniquitous sales-tax provision, to remove a just burden of taxation on the part of those best able to carry it, that we may likewise, in the spirit of bipartisanship, move in a solid mass against that iniquitous provision of the bill and defeat it. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

All time has expired.

Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. White].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this not a perfecting amendment to perfect the text?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a perfecting amendment, as read by the Clerk.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is a substitute amendment that is offered. The gentleman offered it as a substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please allow the Chair to make a statement? The present occupant of the Chair was absent for a few moments, and he is informed by the parliamentary clerk that, during his absence, unanimous consent was granted to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his original proposition and offer the amendment as a perfecting amendment to the original amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Johnson of Washington) there were ayes 39 and noes 113.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Stafford) there were ayes 117 and noes 91.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Crisp and Mr. Johnson of Missouri.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 139, noes 103.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 32. TAXES WITHHELD AT SOURCE

The amount of tax withheld at the source under section 143 shall be allowed as a credit against the tax.

Mr. CRISP and Mr. SWING rose.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. My colleagues, I thank you. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, may I say to you that up to now, and it will be equally true up to the conclusion of the consideration of this bill, I have not uttered one word of criticism against any Member of this House, no matter what his attitude may be toward this bill. I have accorded to each sincerity of purpose. I know I am actuated by but one motive, to perform my public duty to my country as I see it. [Applause.]

I do not believe there has been a member of the Ways and Means Committee that has had any criticism to make of his colleagues in this House.

Gentlemen, the Constitution of the United States says Congress shall lay taxes to pay the debts of the United States, and that instrument further says revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives.

I took an oath to support that sacred document, and I have endeavored to the best of my poor ability to be faithful to that oath.

The Committee on Ways and Means had hearings as to how to raise money to balance the Budget. One hundred and seventy-seven witnesses appeared before us. They all protested against the singling out of a few industries, levying taxes upon them and having them bear the load. They said their business would not stand it.

I have always been just as much opposed to a sales tax as any Member of this House, but, gentlemen, I have never failed to change my opinion when I thought my duty to my country required it. [Applause.]

I am just as much in favor of collecting from wealth all that can be collected as any Member of this House, but under the condition of business to-day you can not raise the money from income, corporation, and inheritance taxes to balance the Budget. Therefore, the question was presented to the committee as to how this money was going to be raised. We doubled the income tax; we doubled the estate tax, and I grant you that if rich men die fast in the future, after the 18 months in which they are allowed to pay, the rates in this bill on inheritances will produce a great deal of money, but they will not produce it for 1933.

The committee met and considered the Treasury program, which provided taxes on a few items—gasoline, the domestic consumption of gas and electricity, increasing the postal rates from 2 to 3 cents, a 5 per cent tax on automobiles, a tax of 2 cents on bank checks, increasing the tax on tobacco one-sixth, and a tax on real-estate transfers. The committee was bombarded with protests from all over the country, and the Members were seen time in and time out by their colleagues in this House saying they could not put a bill of that character through the House.

May I say here that the Treasury Department was opposed to a manufacturers' tax. They repeatedly expressed their opposition to it and urged that the Treasury program be adopted, but after the committee had worked for a week or 10 days in executive session considering these special items, I suggested that a subcommittee be appointed to consider the broad basis of a manufacturers' tax. That was agreed to, and I appointed the majority leader of this House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey], as chairman of that subcommittee, and I sat in with them. The Treasury Department was still opposed to a sales tax. The Treasury Department furnished us their experts and all the information they could to assist in the preparation of the bill. We reported it to the full committee.

As I have said before, this bill is not a Democratic bill; it is not a Republican bill; it is a bill for our Government, an American bill, and the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee shared equal responsibility with the Democratic members, and it is the joint product of all of that committee, Republicans and Democrats alike. [Applause.]

There are things in this bill that I did not want in it. That is true of every other Member, but I am standing for the bill as reported by that committee.

Gentlemen, I may be defeated in my advocacy of the passage of this bill, but I am never a quitter and I do not run under fire. [Applause.] I shall always maintain my integrity and self-respect.

We have reported this bill to the House. The House has a perfect right to work its will. The House has a perfect right to reject any and all of it.

I say to you that if the House should reject the manufacturers' tax title of the bill, the Committee on Ways and Means, I hope, will present to you another program, and I say to you frankly I know of no other program that can be presented which will raise the money to balance the Budget except the Treasury program picking out certain items for special excise taxes, which, of course, will be also sales taxes.

Now, gentlemen, I do not believe the House is in a proper frame of mind to legislate to-day. I think it would do us all good to have an opportunity to cool off and to think. I think it is the part of wisdom that that course be pursued. I hope we may reach some understanding when the committee next resumes its consideration of this bill that we may take up, even out of order, the controverted sections under the manufacturers' tax title and see if we can dispose of them. The Committee on Ways and Means will have some amendments to present to the manufacturers' title, making a few other exemptions.

I thank you gentlemen for your attention; and, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. Chapman, indefinitely, on account of illness.

REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I stand right behind the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] [applause], and I want to talk plainly to this House. It makes no difference what the consequences may be to me. The defeat of any Member of this House is a small matter. It will not make much difference if I am defeated in the next election, but I am going to call your attention now to the dangers into which, I think, we are drifting. This is a crucial hour in the history of this Republic, and there are many of you who do not seem to me to realize it. We must balance the Budget, and we must balance it with real taxes and with real money.

This House, I realize, at the present time is a runaway House. You are adopting measures here without proper consideration, and the committee has determined to rise to enable you gentlemen to consider what you are doing. You have adopted already an amendment to this bill restoring the war rates on incomes. Those rates were imposed at a period of rising markets, when our industries were yielding large returns, and they were imposed at a time when the country was responding to the wild alarms of war, and when every one of our 120,000,000 people was mustering back of the flag and supporting patriotically our armies in the field. We could do it then, but you are imposing these taxes now upon the great incomes at a time when business is declining. They will not yield you as much money, gentlemen, as the taxes suggested in this bill.

You are driving men of large incomes—and their incomes are nothing like what they used to be-into tax-exempt securities, and you can not control that situation. The municipalities and the States have a right to issue tax-exempt securities, and the Federal Government is continually issuing them. You are imposing these high taxes on high incomes at a time when the States are resorting to that method of taxation.

Do you know what the aggregate taxes imposed on high incomes by some of the States, added to the taxes you suggest, amount to? It is time we were finding out something about that.

You are opposed to communism, every one of you, and so am I. I want to maintain this Government as it is [applause]; but let me tell you, gentlemen, during this Congress-and you have put the capsheaf on all of it at the present time—we have made a longer step in the direction of communism than any other country in this world ever made except Russia.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois to whom he refers in that remark?

Mr. RAINEY. I did not refer to you.
Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is evidently referring to the Congress.

Mr. RAINEY. I am telling you what is happening, and I am going to tell you some more.

You gentlemen will answer to your constituents and I will answer to mine.

Mr. RANKIN. And I will answer the gentleman from Illinois if I get a chance.

Mr. RAINEY. We have passed the Reconstruction Finance bill, we have appropriated $500,000,000 to help our railroads, our great arteries of commerce, and to keep our banks going, the method through which money flows out into the channels of trade. We have done all that. If you fail to balance the Budget, you make all these expenditures absolutely useless.

You are bringing about the time when the Government must take over the banks of the country; you are bringing about the time when the Government must take over the railroads. With charges and interest rates which the farmers must pay when they make their loans, and with other propositions affecting agriculture, you are driving the Government into ownership of lands. Our farming lands are not worth much more than they are worth in Russia, and they have no value there whatever. There is only one more step for you to take in imposing taxes which you believe will yield you something, and that is the step they took in Russia to completely eliminate the wealth of this country from figuring further in the affairs of the country. You are right up against communism.

To-morrow I am going to try and look it up and tell you exactly, if I can get the data, what this tax you have imposed on large incomes and the tax States are imposing on the same incomes will amount to, and where the combined taxes will leave you. I am going to show you how near you take all their income. When you have done that, gentlemen, you are nearer communism than any country in the world except Russia.

If you want to dissipate big estates, let us do it in an open way and let the country know what we are doing. Let us bring in a bill for that purpose and do it in the open, and not hide behind a tax bill.

I have no fault to find with any of my colleagues on this side or on the other side. I have no fault to find with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Rankin]—he is thoroughly honest in his opinions, he is a man of great ability. I have the greatest respect for him; he is my friend, and is conscientious—you all have a right to vote according to your conscience. I am simply expressing now briefly some suggestions that come to me in this crucial hour in the history of our country. I am not talking as floor leader on the Democratic side, but as a Member of this House.

There were times during the war when the flag seemed to be fading away, the blue of the flag into the blue of the sky. I am worrying more now than I did then; we are in greater danger than when our boys marched to France and died on the poppy-strewn fields of that country. The Government is in more danger than it was then. That is the reason we are adjourning the House in order to give you time to pause and think.

You will not be expected to follow the ways and means suggestions as contained in this bill. You are the court of last resort. We can suggest to you taxes that will balance the Budget, if you want to defeat the sales tax, and that is the kind of a bill you want. The only question is, Is it less objectionable? If you like the other, it is up to you. If that is what you want, we will bow to the collective judgment of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I concur in what the able gentleman from Georgia, the acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. CRISP], stated when he said that in his judgment this House is in no frame of mind at this hour to legislate. I realize that there has been much impassioned discussion since the bill was brought on the floor and since it has been considered by the Committee of the Whole. There have been some intemperate expressions, and those who have indulged in them will doubtless regret it in their moments of reflection. The question now is. What is our duty at this time? Those of us who oppose the sales-tax provision of the bill, as I said the night before last in my speech, are not disposed to lecture anyone. We do not claim a monopoly on statesmanship, ability, or patriotism. We are to the best of our ability contending for a principle, for what we believe will be for the welfare of all the people. [Applause.] I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey], when he was lecturing the House a moment ago, was doing so as a Member of the House, and not as the majority leader. That is his right. It is not so much a question now of leadership, it is a question of each and every Member of this House honestly, patriotically, and deliberately doing what he thinks is his duty in this very critical hour. I have no fault to find with those who disagree with me, no disposition to lecture them. I am the only member of the Ways and Means Committee who served notice upon the committee that I would vote against the bill when it came upon the floor of the House unless it was materially amended, unless the sales-tax provision was eliminated. I have been treated with the utmost consideration and courtesy by each member of that committee: and it does not lie in my mouth, and I have no disposition to do so, to say to any of them, Why doest thou? and they have not said that to me. I think we should proceed when we meet again as brethren, that we should proceed coolly and deliberately, and that we should have a zeal not according to excitement, but according to knowledge, that we should pass upon these questions as Americans and as patriots, each conceding to the other the right to entertain his own views and express those views as seemeth right unto him.

There has been entirely too much criticism, there has been too much disposition to challenge honest sentiment on both sides of the House. I have no fault to find with those who disagree with me, and I am making now and have made no criticism of the leadership of this House. Gentlemen have a right to their views. This is not a political matter. My failure to follow them does not imply that I am out of harmony or at variance with the leadership of my party. That must be understood. I would defend them from any accusation so far as betraying their party or not being true to it is concerned as quickly as anyone. This is a question of individual duty.

To those who are fighting with me, not following me, against this sales tax, I say, let us keep our passions down, let us not get excited, let us not indulge in any intemperate words or actions, because we are fighting this battle from deep conviction and because we believe there are provisions in the bill which are unjust and unfair and unnecessary to the American people. We who oppose the sales tax should not go to the other extreme and do something that is unjust to any class of people, lest we fall into the same error as those who criticize us. I express the hope that those who are with me in this fight will not reflect upon others or indulge in criticism of those who disagree with us.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] referred to the improbability of balancing the Budget under the program that we are working out. As a matter of fact, with the amendments that we have adopted, and with the amendment that is prepared now and ready to be offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis], and other amendments we shall offer, we will balance the Budget along the same lines that we have been amending the bill for the last two days, and do it without levying a sales tax.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Those of us who do not agree with the sales-tax provisions are just as anxious to balance the Budget, if we know the amount necessary, as those who are in favor of the sales tax.

There is no difference of opinion as to balancing the Budget or preserving the credit of our Government. We are as jealous of that as anyone; but it is a difference as to how the taxes shall be levied, whether or not they shall be levied on consumption and on those who are unable to pay or in accordance with ability to pay. It is an honest difference of judgment.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.
Mr. Laguardia. I want to say to the gentleman that several of us the last few nights have been working on an amendment which will be offered taxing all transactions on the stock exchange one-quarter of 1 per cent, and that will bring in $150,000,000.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the sales-tax provision is eliminated from the bill, then I think the best thing to do is to send the bill back to the Committee on Ways and Means.

I know there are some who oppose that course, but the committee have the information; they have access to the experts, and I believe we can agree upon a bill that will be fair and just and equitable. Certainly the committee could not substitute anything that will be more objectionable, more unreasonable, more unjust, more unfair, in my judgment, than the sales-tax provision of this bill.

But, as I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, whether we agree or whether we disagree, let us come back here next week in the right spirit. Let us put behind us this feeling of resentment one toward another, and as patriots, as American citizens, as men who have the welfare of our country at heart, men who are willing to put country above party, let us give and take and make any reasonable concession that does not conflict with principle and work out some plan whereby the safety, the honor, and credit of our Government will be preserved. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

SENATE

Monday, March 21, 1932

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, who hast committed to our keeping the solemn trust of life; receive us, though unworthy, as we come to Thee in prayer, for Thou art in the prayer we breathe; and make us feel the supreme loveliness of truth and simple goodness as in this sacred presence we consecrate our all to Thee.

Help us to achieve that self-consistency of character which is obtained by an unswerving and undaunted dedication to the ideals of the Christ, who, seeing facts in the clear light of reality, moved in utmost calm above the restless pulse of care, seeking to win men to their highest good by the never-failing miracle of love.

Grant to our Nation the blessings of harmony and concord, making us one in heart and mind and purpose, willing if need be to suffer pain, that, walking in the way of the cross, we may find it none other than the way of life and peace. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Savior. Amen.

PROTECTION OF COPPER AND THE COPPER INDUSTRY

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I present a telegram signed by 267 citizens of Arizona. I ask that the same be read at the desk and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BISBEE, ARIZ., March 21, 1932.

Senator Henry F. Ashurst, Senator Carl Hayden, Congressman L. W. Douglas,

Washington, D. C .:

General depression prevails temporarily throughout industrial United States, but ever-increasing and relentless ruin is rapidly obliterating the remnants of our domestic copper-mining industry due to the uninterrupted importation of billions of pounds of peon, pauper, and slave labor produced copper.

The million of dependent American citizens throughout our 19 copper-producing States are entitled to most adequate protection comparable with the protection of their economic forbears originally received for half century.

Rigid protection permitted the initiation of copper mining 70 years ago throughout our western area, same now providing 90 per cent of domestic production of copper, the metal that is vitally essential during war as well as peace.

All other domestically produced nonferrous metals are highly protected, copper alone being forced to remain within the free-list realm of unrestricted and merciless competition.

The domestic copper manufacturer has been accorded most solicitous and rigid embargo duty rates, and it is un-American and most viciously discriminatory to deny protection for labor engaged in the production of the highly manufactured domestic copper

Thousands of our local copper miners and their dependents are in abject misery and suffering for want of adequate copper pro-

The undersigned citizens from the greatest copper-producing district within the largest domestic copper-producing State urge you to work unceasingly each passing moment to destroy the free-trade copper menace that is bringing increasing ruin and devas-tation and most unprecedented suffering each hour Congress per-trade copper menace that is bringing increasing ruin and devastation and most unprecedented suffering each hour Congress permits such a practice to prevail.

On account of the present deplorable condition of business the country over, we, the undersigned, desire to herewith record our protest against the present and prospective Federal taxation and to further record our conviction that the cost of maintaining the Federal Government must and shall be drastically reduced.

Reports relative to the financial condition of the Government indicate a deficit of more than $2,000,000,000.

The commercial organizations of the country, facing a similar situation, have already radically reduced their costs as a necessary and sound economic measure to pursue.

We therefore respectfully petition you, as our representative, to use your best efforts toward:

(1) Securing an early and thorough reduction of the Federal salary and wage scale;

(2) Eliminating duplication of activities; and
(3) Eliminating every bureau, position, and function of the Federal service that is not in accord with strict economy. Respectfully,

BRUCE F. ROGERS (and others).

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in connection with the petition just read for the elimination and reduction of Government bureaus, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a brief table showing how one bureau has grown from 1913, when it spent $21,936, to 1914, when it spent $25,640, to 1932, when it is estimated that it will spend $395,500. The bureau referred to is the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor. I presume every Senator has received telegrams and letters protesting against the reduction of $100,000 in the appropriation for that bureau which has been recommended by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, these figures, I think, show that executive bureaus do grow, even when we are unsuspicious of them and that a reduction in their expenditures will not be entirely lacking in public interest and appreciation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the table presented by the Senator from Connecticut will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

Mr. FLETCHER. I have here a petition signed in triplicate by certain residents of Coral Gables, Fla., which, through the secretary of the Coral Gables Chamber of Commerce, has been forwarded to me. I ask that the body of the petition be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, and that it be referred to the Appropriations Committee.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and the body thereof was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We respectfully petition you, as our representative, to bring to bear all the effort and pressure at your command to effect the following results:

 A thorough reduction of the Federal salary and wage scale.
 The elimination of all Government positions and functions which constitute a duplication of the position or function in another department or bureau.

3. The elimination of every bureau, position, and function of the Federal service the maintenance of which is not consonant with strictest economy.

In brief we hereby record our conviction that Congress and other Government officials must find ways and means to reduce taxes, and that such reduction must come about principally through a wholesale reduction in the expenditures of the Federal Government.

We are very much in earnest in asking you to use every effort inaugurate and continuously support the program we have

PROPOSED FINANCING OF CREDIT SALES ABROAD OF COTTON AND WHEAT

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram from the Savannah (Ga.) Cotton Exchange, protesting against the proposal made Friday or Saturday of last week by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde, to divert $125,000,000 from farm loans to the Federal Farm Board for the purpose of financing credit sales of cotton and wheat abroad.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAVANNAH, GA., March 19, 1932.

Senator Walter F. George, Washington, D. C.

Whereas information has reached this exchange as follows: The Federal administration proposes to divert $125,000,000 from farm loans to Federal Farm Board to finance credit sales of cotton and wheat abroad: and

Whereas the farm loan of $200,000,000 was intended to be used whereas the farm roan to account of the same and not for marketing financing of the small percentage of the farmers connected with Farm Board affiliates; and

Whereas the proposal would result in killing the sale of all cotton and wheat owned by farmers until the Farm Board stocks had first | manship of this kind which Senator Duncan U. Fletcher has ex-supplied all demand equal to Farm Board stock thus disposed of; and

Whereas the money voted to relieve the farmers would be diverted to the purpose of helping Farm Board affiliates to unload their stock first, leaving the 80 to 90 per cent of the farmers not affiliated with organizations financed by the Farm Board to "hold the bag"; and

Whereas the farm-relief money was voted to relieve the farmers and not the Farm Board and its affiliates; and Whereas the proposal is direct discrimination against American consumers in that it finances with the money of American farmers the foreign consumers who compete with our American consumers for these raw materials produced by American farmers; and

Whereas the price of wheat and cotton will immediately reflect this curtailed demand with a corresponding decline in the already low price to the further injury of our farming population: Therefore be it

Resolved by the members of the Savannah Cotton Exchange in meeting assembled, That, first, we strongly protest against the pro-posal as outlined in article contained in Savannah Evening Press posal as outlined in article contained in Savannah Evening Press of March 18, entitled "U. S. Plans Big Sales Campaign"; second, that a copy of these resolutions be wired to Secretary of Agriculture Hyde with a request that the program be definitely abandoned; third, that copies be wired to Georgia Senators and Representatives in Congress with request that they use every effort to defeat any such program; fourth, that copies be wired to all cotton exchanges requesting similar action on their part.

SAVANNAH COTTON EXCHANGE,

BONETT PERRIN President

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR FLETCHER

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in a number of Florida newspapers there has appeared a very fitting and appropriate tribute to my colleague the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher]. It is written by Dr. Harry Block, of Miami, Fla. I desire that this tribute may be printed in the main body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRIBUTE TO HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, FLORIDA'S SENIOR UNITED STATES SENATOR

By Dr. Harry Block

A self-perfecting vitality, as Carlyle defines it, prompts men to read and think and work incessantly. To grow mentally is primarily a matter of the will. The process of unfolding does not come of itself along with the passing of the years; it is the result of striving. "Possunt quia posse videntur"—success comes to those who are resolved to succeed. Great men have a trait in common—they continually display consciously directed efforts to increase their powers, thus growing year by year to the fulfillment of their capacities. They reflect upon their experiences and draw conclusions from them. They not only achieve power from assirconclusions from them. They not only achieve power from aspiring to something but declare themselves upon occasion and exert their influence in the world. What elevates man to the highest strata of achievement and character? Not alone a character well balanced or a temperament well ordered or a mind well discipaired of a temperament wen ordered of a mind wen disci-plined but rather a genuine effusion of cooperation, of generous and single-minded devotion to the loftiest of human ideals— namely, service to our fellow beings through the pursuit of truth and the maintenance at all times of intellectual and spiritual endeavor and accomplishment.

We must not deny ourselves the privilege of participating in the We must not deny ourselves the privilege of participating in the honor of paying tribute to the character and achievements of Hon. Duncan U. Fletcher, a type precious as it is rare. Let us pause and reflect upon the courage and fortitude with which he has gone forth in his official work at Washington—the American merchant marine, emergency-credit expansion, rallroad-freight rates, exemption of Panama Canal tolls of United States vessels, the tariff, child labor. How often has he remarked of them the bold and timely and fitting word when timeservers and sycophants were defaming the truth to serve the hour and themselves. Great services are these—great in their beneficence to mankind—yet great as they are they seem parochial when contrasted with his profound as they are they seem parochial when contrasted with his profound conception of justice and character. His life has been exceedingly simple and his wants few and modest.

In one of his public addresses he remarks as follows: The public desire and have a right to require that the official holding its power of attorney shall stand steadfastly for the welfare of the people—yield to no pressure, whether of particular friends or powerful political or financial influences that would friends or powerful political or inflation inflations that whole people. The fidelity they have a right to insist on is of that positive, aggressive, vigilant kind which means something more than complacently moving along lines of least resistance. The honesty they placently moving along lines of least resistance. The honesty they have a right to demand is of that broad nature which means something more than keeping out of jail. Honesty, courage, and ability, in the order named, are the qualities demanded in the high official position."

It is the mission of statesmanship to search among the treasures for the best possible answer to present requirements and to recognize that from age to age ideas are more or less constant in the world mind, but that their value varies from decade to decade according to their usefulness at the present moment. It is states-emplified in our time. As the man, he has become the picturesque embodiment of purity of life and nobility of thought, whose quickly sensitive and highly gifted mind has been played upon by the deeper inclinations which are shaping the rapidly moving events of our times. His faith is unshakable, his love for God and man strong, and his devotion to right and justice constant. Ancient Athens might have beckoned us to reflect upon Pericles. Ancient Rome might have summoned Cæsar as a witness. But here we have the man indifferent to recognition reward, or fame. here we have the man indifferent to recognition, reward, or fame, who, with undaunted fear and loyally reverent to the principles of righteousness, illimitably labors for the common good—regardless of race, creed, or religion.

And here in the arena of life there is many a noble encounter And here in the arena of life there is many a noble encounter for the man of heroic spirit and judicious mind. His 30 or more years of public service surpass the span of the 20-year war that Ulysses had fought and of his years of adventure that followed. It was at the expiration of those 20 years that Ulysses spoke in words that might well be those of Senator Duncan U. FLETCHER—
"Some work of noble note may yet be done not unbecoming men that strive with God."

He has given us meant things but above all he has given us the

He has given us many things, but above all he has given us the influence and example of his manhood and character.

AMENDMENT OF FARM LOAN BANK ACT

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill in the way of an amendment to the Federal farm loan act; and I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I explain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Idaho will be recognized.

The bill (S. 4150) to amend article 9, section 12, of an act entitled "An act to provide capital for agricultural development, to create a standard form of investment based upon farm mortgage, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes," passed and approved July 17, 1916, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, according to the terms of the act of January 23, 1932, it is provided that—

The sum of $25,000,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated under section 5 of this act, as amended, shall be used exclusively for the purpose of supplying any bank with funds to use in its operations in place of any amounts of which such bank may be deprived by reason of extensions made as provided in this paragraph.

It was supposed that under this act a more liberal policy would be pursued with reference to defaulting mortgagors. It does not seem that any more liberal policy has yet been inaugurated.

The farm-land banks are now demanding chattel mortgages upon the anticipated crops of the farmers. That of itself seems to me harsh. But not only are they asking for mortgages but they are asking for 8 per cent interest.

I undertake to say that there is literally no hope for the farmer if he must pay interest upon the mortgage on his land at the rate now required, and also pay 8 per cent interest upon the default.

It is claimed by the farm-loan people that they are required to charge that rate because of the terms of article 9, section 12, which reads:

Every borrower shall pay simple interest on defaulted payments at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, and by express covenant in his mortgage deed shall undertake to pay—

And so forth. This section provides in both instances, on default, for 8 per cent interest.

The amendment I am proposing would make the interest not to exceed 6 per cent. If I find I have the support I shall make the rate lower. This article 9, section 12, was undoubtedly placed in the law in the first instance in the way of a penalty to prevent the farmer from permitting defaults where he could possibly obviate them, but the conditions which now confront the farmer are such that he can not control that matter, and the object and purpose of putting the rate at 8 per cent can not be accomplished under the circumstances which exist at the present time. He is penalized for something he can not control.

I understand that at present we are lending money, under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, at 5 to  $5\frac{1}{2}$  and 6 per cent. I can see no reason, if that be true, why it would not be within reason and justice and equity to amend the farm loan act so as to permit the farm-loan banks to take this default security at a rate not to exceed 5 or 6 per cent.

I offer this amendment, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I do not know whether it covers the entire subject. In the time I have had to prepare it, I may have overlooked some of the other provisions of the act which need correction, but, in my opinion, from the study I have been able to give to it, it does cover the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

RELIEF OF JAMES M. GRIFFIN

Mr. JOHNSON introduced a bill (S. 4166) for the relief of James M. Griffin, disbursing agent, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and (with the accompanying papers) referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT TO ACCOMPANY DRAFT OF LEGISLATION FOR THE RELIEF OF MR. JAMES M. GRIFFIN. DISBURSING AGENT, UNITED STATES COAST AND

This proposed legislation authorizes and directs the General Accounting Office to credit the accounts of Mr. James M. Griffin, disbursing agent, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, in the amount of $361.33, which sum represents the aggregate of payments made by him during the fiscal year 1930 to various civilian officers and employees of the Coast and Geodetic Survey as reimbursement of expenses incurred in travel in connection with the field work of that bureau under orders signed by the director.

The legislation also provides that the various-named civilian officers and employees shall not be required to make refund to the Government on account of payments which have been made by Mr. Griffin to the carriers for travel furnished by the carriers on transportation requests in connection with the same accounts upon which the disallowances were made by the General Accounting Office.

The legislation, if enacted, will involve no appropriation, but

The legislation, if enacted, will involve no appropriation, but only a credit for money already expended.

While the accounts will be taken up individually later, one general statement will apply to all. The disallowances were made by the General Accounting Office and have been sustained by the Comptroller General upon the grounds that the orders directing the travel were signed by the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and had not been approved by the head of the department. The General Accounting Office ruled that even though the travel was in connection with the regular field work of the bureau, and the civilian officers and employees named were not appointed to was in connection with the regular field work of the bureau, and the civilian officers and employees named were not appointed to positions at a particular place, the movements called for in the orders directing the travel constituted transfers from one duty station to another within the meaning of section 2 of the act of December 30, 1928, id., 1055.

It should be stated that the same procedure in regard to orders directing the travel was followed as has been followed for years; namely, the orders were written by the director in accordance with regulations approved by the Secretary of Commerce for the government of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The first intimation from the General Accounting Office to for the government of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The first intimation from the General Accounting Office to the effect that travel such as had been performed by these civilian officers and employees constituted transfer from one official station to another in accordance with the intent of the act of December 22, 1927 (45 Stat. 50), and section 2 of the act of December 30, 1928, id. 1055, was in the notices of exception taken by the General Accounting Office to the accounts of Mr. Griffin for the quarter ending December 31, 1929. These notices of exception were dated April 22, 1930. Immediately upon receipt of these notices of exception the necessary steps were taken to have all orders issued subsequent to that date approved by the head of the department, but all such orders issued prior to that head of the department, but all such orders issued prior to that date and included in the accounts of Mr. Griffin for the quarters ending December 31, 1929, March 31, 1930, and June 30, 1930, had not been so approved and exceptions were taken to all of them by the General Accounting Office.

them by the General Accounting Office.

The field work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey by its very nature requires almost constant travel of personnel. A particular project in any given locality will require the presence of personnel for such length of time as is necessary for the completion of the work. Upon its completion, work in another locality will be taken up necessitating the travel of the personnel some of whom are included in the category of civilian officers and employees, to the location of the new project. Without entering into a discussion as to whether this travel constitutes transfers within the meaning of the statutes cited, it may be stated that the General Accounting Office so regards it and the procedure outlined by them must be followed.

Under orders dated November 13, 1929, Deck Officer John C. Ellerbe, jr., traveled from Washington, D. C., to San Francisco, Calif. #### WHEAT AND COTTON-ADDRESS BY W. G. M'ADOO

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for publication in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. W. G. McAdoo before the Salesmanship Club of Houston, Tex., on March 19, 1932, entitled "How to Save Our Wheat and Cotton Farmers and Revive General Prosperity."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

I am going to talk to you about agriculture and the economic

I am going to talk to you about agriculture and the economic condition of the farmer. You may think that is a strange topic to discuss with salesmen, but the fact is that it concerns business men as much as anyone except the farmers themselves.

You all know it is impossible to sell to a man who has no purchasing power. That is the condition of the farmer to-day, and that is why you are not selling him any goods. If his purchasing power could be restored, he would again become your profitable customer; this would help you and your business. Therefore, as salesmen and business men you are interested in agriculture and in any sound plan to put the farmer back on his feet financially.

Much has been written during recent years about the plight of in any sound plan to put the farmer back on his feet financially. Much has been written during recent years about the plight of the farmer. I think it fair to say that business men generally have been unsympathetic, feeling that the problem was an isolated one which did not concern them. Some have even thought that the matter was being agitated solely for political purposes. Even today, after two years of depression, business as a whole has little knowledge of the real agricultural situation. Still less is it recognized that this situation is one of the basic causes of the depression itself. The question continues to be with us in spite of all sion itself. The question continues to be with us, in spite of all sion itself. The question continues to be with us, in spite of all the remedies that have been adopted and all the prescriptions that have been offered. No one knows or can predict with any degree of certainty, how long the disorder will last.

The recently enacted Glass-Steagall bill, which widens the base of Federal reserve credit, offers to the banks of the country the opportunity to stop the long and disastrous policy of restricting credits and gives promise of substantial relief to sorely pressed debtors, struggling business, and enterprise, if the banks now pursue a more liberal credit policy.

But the Glass-Steagall bill will not, in itself, restore prosperity. It can not alone increase the purchasing power of the people or

But the Glass-Steagall bill will not, in itself, restore prosperity. It can not alone increase the purchasing power of the people or relieve unemployment. Enlarged credit is a helpful instrumentality for accelerating a return to normal conditions only if the fundamental causes of the trouble are remedied.

Chief among the fundamental causes of the depression is the condition of agriculture, and especially those phases of it represented by two great staple commodities—wheat and cotton. I select these not alone because they constitute one of the largest sources of farm income, but because they strike me as the crux sources of farm income, but because they strike me as the crux of the farm problem on account of their large exportable surplus, which differentiates them from other farm commodities and places them in an extremely difficult position.

It is not, I think, necessary to argue that agriculture is, more than any other single industry, the foundation of national prosperity; that an impoverished farm class is an economic sore spot which affects the entire body politic. This is generally conceded.

EXAMINATION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL | If we can find the means of restoring the purchasing power of the farmer, we shall be able to reconstruct our shattered economic foundations and we may then proceed with confidence to erect the superstructure of a new prosperity.

I dislike to use statistics in a speech, but as a necessary background to my argument I must introduce some data of that character.

During 1927, the latest year for which I have available figures, the number of gainfully occupied persons in the United States was about 45,000,000, made up approximately, as follows:

Engaged in agriculture_ 8,500,000 Engaged in manufacturing industries_____ All others 25, 750, 000

It was in 1914 that Henry Ford announced his minimum wage of $5 per day for employees in his plants. The effect of this is reflected in the figures of succeeding years.

In the 15-year period from 1913 to 1927, inclusive, there was a large increase in the gross per capita earnings of salaried employees and wage workers engaged in manufacturing, but in the agricultural line the increase was much less, as shown by the following table:

Salaries of wage workers engaged in manufacturing, 1913 and 1927

	1913	1927	Per cent increase
Average annual earnings: Salaried employees. Wage workers	$1,066 594	$2, 084 1, 205	95 103
Average gross annual income per person gainfully oc- cupied in agriculture	895	1, 387	55

You will observe that the position of the farmer improved only a little more than half as much as that of the salaried employee and the wage worker. In 1913 the total agricultural income was $7,886,000,000, while in 1927 it was $11,698,000,000. It is estimated that the gross agricultural income for 1931 will be approximately $6,500,000,000. Assuming that the number of persons gainfully occupied in agriculture was the same as in 1927 (8,500,000), the gross income per capita for 1931 would be about $765. On the basis of 300 working days this would amount to a gross per diem rate of less than $2.55.

Now, remember that the figure of $2.55 per day is gross. From Now, remember that the figure of $2.55 per day is gross. From it must be deducted taxes, interest, maintenance, fertilization, and other operating expenses.

During the 15-year period we are discussing, the expenses of Government, including Federal, State, and local, increased more than 400 per cent, with a corresponding increase in general taxation. taxation.

Without sufficient income to meet his expenses, the farmer has Without sufficient income to meet his expenses, the farmer has had to increase his borrowings from banks until farm mortgages amounted to $9,500,000,000 in 1928, as compared with $3,600,000,000 in 1910. The interest charges on these obligations constitute a heavy part of the farmer's costs.

After deducting these items, together with his operating expenses, it is obvious that the average net return to the farmer is nominal. This situation has reduced his purchasing power to a minimum and, in turn, has vitally affected industry and its employees persons.

With the farmer virtually eliminated as a customer, industry has been forced to curtail operations. This has resulted in unemployment on the industrial side to the extent of about 7,000,000 persons.

These unemployed, like the farmer, are without purchasing power. There are, therefore, about 15,500,000 potential customers (8,500,000 farmers and 7,000,000 unemployed), not counting their dependents, who are not buying manufactured goods. Thus, the condition of agriculture, generally supposed to be a problem concerning the farmer only, is seen to be of direct and paramount importance to the wage earner and to industry generally.

Unless something effective is done to actively counteract and correct the declining trend of agricultural income it is probable.

correct the declining trend of agricultural income, it is probable that the condition of the farmer in the United States will continue to grow progressively worse. That a program of correction is exigent must be obvious to anyone who considers the size and importance of the farm community.

importance of the farm community.

Of the total United States population in 1930, over 27,000,000 were farmers and their dependents working or living directly on farms. In addition, there were another 26,000,000 in small towns and communities under 2,500 population, whose prosperity depends directly upon farm prosperity. Thus nearly 44 per cent of the population of the United States is still rural and semirural. Both from an economic and social standpoint, the prosperity of so large a part of the population is vitally important in determining the prosperity of the country as a whole. Any plan which will materially increase the income of this group is bound to exert a great influence toward the betterment of national business exert a great influence toward the betterment of national business conditions.

The fundamental difficulty of the cotton and wheat farmers is that they must sell their crops in the United States, as well as in export markets, at world prices; that is, prices established in the Liverpool market, based upon world supply and demand. Under this system, the American farmer receives no more for his cotton or wheat than the peasant of Europe, Russia, Argentina, or India, where living standards are far lower than those in the United

The situation is the same as would exist if, for example, the steel manufacturers of the United States had to sell their products in this country at the world price. If this were actually the case, the prosperity of the steel industry and the steel workers would be seriously hurt.

The fact is that the steel manufacturers are protected by adequate tariffs on their products, which give them control over their domestic markets, and they sell their surplus at what they can get in the competitive markets of the world, without affecting the price which they receive at home.

If the producers of wheat and cotton were protected to such an extent that they could sell the amount of wheat and cotton consumed in the United States at remunerative prices, they could then take their chances, as manufacturers do, on the disposition of their surplus in the competitive markets of the world.

It is true that there is now a tariff duty of 42 cents per bushel on wheat. But this is wholly ineffective because the surplus wheat production and not the tariff controls the price. Thus the Chicago price for wheat has for years been the Liverpool price less the cost of transportation.

There is no tariff on short-staple cotton, but even if there were it would be no more effective, under present conditions, than the tariff on wheat.

The cotton and wheat farmers operate under another handicap Although, as already shown, they must sell their crops at world prices, they are obliged to hire their labor and to purchase their equipment and supplies at United States prices. Data compiled by the United States Department of Agriculture show that the farmers' costs were, in November, 1931, 23 per cent greater than

Thus the American farmer sells in an unprotected market and buys in a protected one. He is outside of our tariff walls when he sells and inside of it when he buys. He therefore loses at both

Before we can intelligently consider means of bettering the farmer's position, we must analyze the sources of farm income to determine, first, from what products the major portion of that income is derived; and, second, which of these products has income is derived; and, second, w suffered the greatest decline in price.

In discussing farm income we must be careful to distinguish between the farm value of the various products and their income value to the farmer. Several of the major crops are of large total value; but since only a small portion of them is sold off the farm, they are not a direct and immediate source of income to the farm group. For example, although corn and hay are the leading staple crops, from the point of view of farm value they are minor sources of direct farm income. Practically all of the hay is fed to live-stock, while five-sixths of the corn is fed to hogs; only one-sixth is sold outside the farm group.

Efforts to increase farm income can be most effectively directed at those products which bring quick income from the outside into the farm group. From this standpoint cotton and wheat are among the largest sources, accounting for more than 20 per cent of the total farm income in normal times. For instance, cotton represents 13.1 per cent and wheat 7.2 per cent of the total farm income.

Due to our unbalanced economic order, caused by long-continued tariff policies which have protected the manufacturer but not the farmer, our wheat and cotton producers have borne the brunt of the losses that have befallen agriculture. It is in these two branches of the farm industry that the need for relief is greatest, and it is here that the largest possibilities of quickly increasing farm income lie.

In devising a plan to accomplish this we must investigate each industry separately.

Speaking in round rather than with strictly accurate figures, let us assume that the average cotton crop in the United States for the past 13 years has been 13,500,000 bales per annum, of which 6,000,000 bales are sold in this country and 7,500,000 bales are for

Under present conditions all of the 13,500,000 bales are sold at the world price, which is around  $6\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound. There is nothing we can do to change the world price. Consequently, the 7,500,000 bales which are exportable must continue to be sold at that price.

It is in the domestic market that measures of control should and can be made effective. At present domestic prices are the same as world prices. They will remain so as long as no governmental steps are taken to bring about a differential. The American consumer of cotton gets the benefit of these world maladjustments and low prices, but the American cotton grower takes the losses.

The first thing we must recognize is that the cotton producer is entitled to receive a higher price for the cotton he sells in the domestic market than for the cotton he sells in the world market. the point of view of both producer and consumer, Government measures to assure a remunerative price for cotton consumed in the United States are thoroughly justified. This can be ac-in the United States are thoroughly justined. This can be accomplished only by giving the cotton grower tariff protection on that part of his crop which is absorbed by the home market.

Let us consider the effect that higher prices would have on the cotton farmer's income.

Suppose that a tariff duty of 12 cents per pound on the cotton consumed in the United States was imposed; that the present world price of 6½ cents per pound was raised to 18½ cents per pound through the operation of this tariff, and that this increase ould be put into the pockets of the farmers who raise the crops.

On the basis of a domestic consumption of 6,000,000 bales the price increase of 12 cents per pound resulting from such a tariff would enlarge the cotton farmer's income by $360,000,000 per

Now, let us consider the effect that a higher domestic price would likely have, both on domestic production and consumption. In general, higher prices stimulate production. There are still great areas of potential cotton land in the South, particularly in Texas. With cotton on a more profitable basis the farmer would naturally be inclined to shift from other crops into cotton and to develop new areas. This would enlarge the production of cotton and would tend to further reduce the income from that part of the crop which must be sold in foreign markets. It will be necessary, in any practicable plan, to devise some means by which overproduction may be discouraged or restrained.

The influence of a higher domestic price for raw cotton would e most serious to that part of the textile industry which exports finished cotton cloth and other goods. These manufacturers have to compete in a world market with other manufacturers who can buy their cotton at lower prices. However, production costs would not, by any means, be increased in direct proportion to the increase in the cost of the raw material. Raw cotton constitutes not more than 30 per cent, on the average, of the cost of the finnot more than 30 per cent, on the average, of the cost of the inished product. Doubling the price of raw cotton would increase the cost of production by less than one-third. Wholesale prices of cotton cloth do not fluctuate to anything like the extent that the prices of raw cotton do. We must recognize, however, that domestic exporters of cotton goods might be placed at some disadvantage by a tariff on short staple cotton, but this might be overcome by a compensatory increase in the existing tariffs on cotton textiles.

Analyses made by the Department of Agriculture show that the volume of textile consumption depends principally upon current business conditions more than upon price. This is in conrent business conditions more than upon price. This is in contrast with foreign countries, where price changes stimulate or retard consumption. It is not to be expected that an increase in raw-cotton prices from the present subnormal level to a point even though well below the average of the last five years will greatly reduce consumption in the United States or materially increase the cost of manufactured cotton to consumers.

Speaking again in round figures, let us assume that the wheat crop in the United States amounts to 800,000,000 bushels per annum, of which 600,000,000 bushels are sold domestically and 200,000,000 are exportable.

As in the case of cotton, the world price is beyond our control and the 200,000,000 bushels for export must continue to be sold at that price.

This leaves, subject to domestic regulation, the 600,000,000 bushels which are sold in the United States.

The present flexible tariff duty of 42 cents per bushel is too low in view of the low world price. The duty should be increased to 65 cents per bushel. If a means can be found whereby this duty can be added to the price of wheat consumed in the United States, the wheat farmer's income will be increased by $390,000,000 per year.

The inevitable result of a great and sustained improvement in price for any commodity is to stimulate increased production. In the past, wheat acreage has expanded with higher prices. It is probable that a moderate rise from the present subnormal level would not immediately bring a large expansion in acreage. ever, as in the case of cotton, any plan for increasing substantially the price of wheat in the domestic market must be accompanied by some practicable method for discouraging or regulating production.

Statistics show that in the past increases in the price of wheat have had practically no effect on the volume of consumption or on the price of bread and other bakery products to the consumer. An increase of 65 cents per bushel in the price of wheat would therefore have little, if any, effect on the price which the consumer pays for bread. After these preliminaries you ask: What is the plan? I shall give it to you.

The salvation of the wheat and cotton farmers of the United States revolves around a tariff on these commodities sufficiently high to preserve for the producers the home market against outside competition. This must be accompanied by Federal regulation which will enable the farmers to get the full benefit of tariff protection awarded to them on that part of their crop consumed in the United States.

The present tariff duty on wheat is merely a gesture. The farmer receives no benefit from it, for the simple reason that no means have been provided for transferring to his pocket the paper protection thus offered to him.

Practically the entire cotton crop of the United States is what is known as short staple. There is no tariff on short staple, but there is a tariff of 10 cents per pound on long-staple cotton. This gives no help to cotton growers, because only a negligible amount of long staple is produced in this country.

The Congress should, without delay, impose a flexible tariff on short-staple cotton, the initial rate to be at least 12 cents per pound—in order that the cotton farmer, as well as the wheat farmer, may have the domestic market preserved for him—and receive, as a part of the price of the raw cotton he sells for United States consumption, the tariff duty of 12 cents per pound.

The Congress should promptly enact a law providing, in its essentials, that the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, shall have power:

1. To determine, as of some convenient date or dates, each year, the percentage of the wheat and cotton crops for that year which shall be:

(a) For United States consumption; and

(a) For export or foreign consumption, and
(b) For export or foreign consumption.

2. To fix annually, or semiannually, or quarterly, the minimum prices at which wheat and cotton may be lawfully bought and sold for United States consumption—the prices so fixed to represent, as nearly as may be, the world price prevailing at the time, plus the flexible tariff then in effect upon wheat and cotton.

3. After the Secretary of Agriculture has determined the percentages for United States and foreign consumption, and the minimum prices for wheat and cotton, it shall be unlawful for any minimum prices for wheat and cotton, it shall be unlawful for any person to buy from any farmer or producer, or for any farmer or producer to sell wheat or cotton at less than the minimum prices so prescribed. Each transaction shall be based upon the percentages for United States and foreign consumption established by the Secretary of Agriculture; and the purchasers shall be required to pay at least the established minimum price for the percentage fixed for United States consumption and the prevailing world price for the percentage fixed for foreign consumption.

4. To increase or decrease, annually or semiannually, the flexible tariff rates on wheat and cotton.

5. To promulgate from time to time such regulations as in his

5. To promulgate from time to time such regulations as in his judgment may be necessary or expedient for carrying into effect the provisions of the act.

6. For each and every violation of the act the offender to be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, and, in addition, to be liable to the aggrieved party in double the amount of the purchase or sale, recoverable in a civil action by the aggrieved party in any court of competent jurisdiction.

7. The tariff of 12 cents per pound on short-staple cotton, like the tariff on wheat, to be subject to the flexible provisions of the existing tariff act, and a compensatory increase in the tariffs on cotton textiles to be permitted, the amount of such increase to be determined by the Tariff Commission under the provisions of existing law.

I shall not attempt to go into details, such as resales and other natters which will naturally arise, because these can be taken care of by the Secretary of Agriculture under the broad power of regulation which is to be conferred upon him by the proposed act.

Has Congress the constitutional power to enact legislation of this character? On this question I have no doubt.

while it is true that there is difficulty in separating intrastate and interstate transactions in wheat and cotton, I am convinced that a Federal law applying to the whole field of commerce in these commodities would be constitutional. The Supreme Court of the United States held, in the case of Stafford v. Wallace, that "the authority of Congress extends to every part of interstate commerce and to every instrumentality or agency by which it is carried on, and the full control by Congress of the subjects committed to its regulation is not to be denied or thwarted by the commingling of interstate and intrastate operations. * * * The execution by Congress of its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce is not limited by the fact that intrastate transactions may have become so interwoven therewith that the effective government of the former incidentally controls the latter. This conclusion necessarily results from the supremacy of the National Government within its appointed sphere."

The Congress has asserted its power to control interstate and foreign commerce with respect to wheat and cotton in such comprehensive legislation as the grain futures act, the United States warehouse act, the United States grain standards act, the United States cotton futures act, the United States cotton futures act, the United States cotton standards act, and the agricultural marketing act. The Supreme Court of the United States, in upholding the constitutionality of the grain standards act, the United States, in upholding the constitutionality of the grain standards act, the United States, in upholding the constitutionality of the grain standards act the property of the grain standards act the standards act that the standards act the property of the grain standards act the grain standards act

United States, in upholding the constitutionality of the grain futures act, enunciated the principle that Congress has the power to regulate cotton and wheat prices.

However, if any serious doubt is entertained as to the sole power of the Federal Government to enact the proposed legislation, the result can undoubtedly be accomplished through cooperative legislation by the wheat and cotton growing States.

The effect of the proposed plan would be to increase the present prices of wheat in the markets of the United States by the proposed tariff duty of 65 cents per bushel and the price of shortstaple cotton by the proposed tariff duty of 12 cents per pound. On the basis of present quotations, these commodities would sell, for United States consumption, at the following prices:

	Liver- pool world price	Duty	United States price
Wheat per bushel	$0.75	$0.65	$1.40
	.06}2	.12	.18½

No one can say that these United States prices would be unduly high. In the depression year, 1921, the average price of wheat was $1.31 per bushel, and the average price of cotton was 19 cents per pound.

Let us now take an assumed transaction after such a law has been put into effect

A farmer goes to his grain elevator to sell 400 bushels of wheat. Let us suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture has declared, with respect to the then current wheat crop, that 75 per cent is for United States consumption and 25 per cent is for foreign consumption, and that the Secretary of Agriculture has also fixed the minimum price for United States consumption at $1.40 per bushel (being 75 cents per bushel, Liverpool world price, plus 65 cents per bushel, tariff)

The farmer would receive from the grain elevator $1.40 per bushel for 300 bushels (75 per cent for United States con- sumption)	1 8420
He would receive 75 cents per bushel for 100 bushels (25 per cent for foreign consumption)	1 75
Total	495

Let us now turn to cotton:

A farmer wants to sell 10 bales or 5,000 pounds. Assume that the Secretary of Agriculture has declared, with respect to the then current cotton crop, that 45 per cent is for United States consumption and 55 per cent is for export or foreign consumption, and that the Secretary of Agriculture has also fixed the minimum price for United States consumption at  $18\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound (being cents per pound, world price, plus 12 cents per pound, tariff).

The farmer would receive from the purchaser 18½ cents per pound for 2,250 pounds (45 per cent for United States consumption)

He would receive 6½ cents per pound for 2,750 pounds (55 per cent for world consumption) 2 8416. 25 2 178. 75

By this plan the new money put into the pockets of the wheat and cotton farmers in one year would be $390,000,000 for wheat and $360,000,000 for cotton, a total of $750,000,000.

This increased income would so enlarge the purchasing power of these two great agricultural classes that it would tremendously stimulate business in every direction. All other agricultural producers would share in the prosperity thus created. A strong demand would spring up immediately for manufactured goods. This would result in the reemployment of labor on a large scale. Prosperity would begin to permeate all classes, because it would begin would result in the reemployment of labor on a large scale. Prosperity would begin to permeate all classes, because it would begin at the foundation, the only place where it can have a sound beginning and receive a healthy growth.

It is not, I think, essential for the Secretary of Agriculture to consider the world price in fixing the United States minimums. A fair price may be established, regardless of the world price, so long as the minimum in the United States is not put at a level which will provoke foreign competition. This can be controlled through the fiexible tariff.

My emphatic view is that the cotton and wheat farmers are

My emphatic view is that the cotton and wheat farmers are entitled to economic security in the home market and that it is impossible to recreate general prosperity until the producers of basic commodities are restored to a prosperous status. I have long held the opinion, and I am doubly confirmed in it as a result of the experience of the past two years, that farmers are more entitled to tariff benefits and tariff protection than overgrown manufacturers.

I have always been opposed to excessive tariffs; but since that policy has been forced upon the Nation until it has become deeply policy has been forced upon the Nation until it has become deeply embedded in our economic structure, I want the farmer to participate in its benefits on equal terms with industry.

There is economic justification for doing every reasonable thing that can be done through wise national legislation to promote the welfare of the primary producers of agricultural products, because it is self-evident that a sound basis for general prosperity can not be found until those who produce food and raiment for the people are rescued from the poverty which now envelops them.

The method I have suggested does not interfere with the normal

The method I have suggested does not interfere with the normal course of commerce. It is simple in its operation; it is not strangled with red tape; it automatically converts into money the benefits of a tariff on that part of the crops which are consumed in the United States and puts that money into the pockets of the wheat and cotton growers. While it will be unlawful to buy or wheat and cotton growers. While it will be unlawful to buy or sell wheat or cotton for domestic consumption at less than the minimum prices prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, no limitation is put upon trading in these commodities above the minimum prices. Only the exportable surpluses of these crops are forced into competition in the world markets. But world prices will not be permitted, after the adoption of this plan, to slaughter our farmers any longer by destroying the value of wheat and cotton in the markets of the United States. Our farmers will be put on a parity with our protected manufacturers.

By this plan it will not be necessary to maintain a Farm Board or any bureaucratic agency at Washington, with a capital of $500,000,000 in money, taken from the United States Treasury, and used to speculate in the grain and cotton markets. The huge losses taxpayers have already suffered from the unfortunate Farm Board experiment should warn us against a continuation of such an unsound and fruitless policy.

We have recently created a Reconstruction Finance Corporation and have given it $500,000,000—money taken from the United States Treasury—and in addition $1,500,000,000, to be raised by the sale of bonds, guaranteed both as to principal and interest by the United States. The benefits of this colossal appropriation—&lt;sup>1</sup> After deducting the cost of transportation, which is included in the above Liverpool price, the farmer would get $1 per bushel for that part of his wheat consumed in the United States.

The cost of transportation to be deducted.

$2,000,000,000 in money and credit belonging to the people—un-precedented in time of peace—are confined to certain favored interests—banks, railroads, insurance companies, and other corthe control and management of which are in private hands and for whose mistakes and for whose condition the people of the United States are not responsible. It is a dangerous experiment and, in my opinion, a perversion of the powers of democratic government-certainly as we have been taught to understand

I venture to say that even one-third of this vast sum, injected I venture to say that even one-third of this vast sum, injected into the arteries of enfeebled and sinking agriculture through a diffusion of the benefits of a properly applied tariff policy, would return prosperity to the people of the United States with greater speed and certainty than can be expected from any conceivable effort and expenditure the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may make. The same thing may be said of various other superficial remedies adopted at Washington and loaded upon the Treasure during the past two years.

ury during the past two years.

I realize, of course, that the more remunerative the price the greater is the inducement to the farmer to expand his acreage and greater is the inducement to the farmer to expand his acreage and increase production. The purpose of conferring upon the Secretary of Agriculture, subject to the approval of the President, the power to increase or decrease the flexible tariff on wheat and cotton is to enable him to discourage or encourage production by the use of this power and to use the power promptly. It will be possible for the Secretary of Agriculture to establish, in advance of the planting of the crops, the minimum price for United States of the planting of the crops, the minimum price for United States consumption upon an assumed gross production of wheat and cotton. This minimum price will specify the amount of flexible tariff on each of these crops, based upon the assumed production. The Secretary of Agriculture may go further and say that the flexible tariff will be increased in proportion to any decrease in the assumed production, and that it will be reduced in proportion to any excess above the base figure.

To illustrate: Suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture announced that upon the basis of an 800,000,000-bushel crop of wheat for 1932 the flexible tariff would be 65 cents per bushel; that if the crop should be 700,000,000 bushels, the flexible tariff would be increased one-eighth, or from 65 cents to 73 cents per bushel. On other other hand, if the crop should be 900,000,000 bushels, the flexible tariff of 65 cents would be reduced one-eighth, or to 57 cents per bushel. The farmer, with a definite chart of this sort before him, would have an intelligent basis upon which he could proceed to plant his crop. As it is now, he goes it blind, without anything to guide him, and we get excessive production, with starvation prices, in some years, and reduced production, with remunerative prices, in other years. A similar application could be made to cotton.

be made to cotton.

A number of Southern States have recently enacted laws for A number of Southern States have recently enacted laws for compulsory reduction of cotton acreage as a solution of the problem. These efforts are well meant, but I do not believe that they will prove efficacious, even if the laws are valid. As to their legality, I have grave doubt. Any arbitrary reduction of acreage will hit the small and poverty-stricken farmers much harder than the larger and more fortunate ones. But aside from this, reduction of acreage, without the power to control fertilization and intensive farming, might result in the production of crops, on half of the same acreage, as large almost as those produced, without fertilization and intensive farming, on the normal acreage. I can not help feeling that any interference by law with the right of the farmer to plant his land as in his judgment seems best—and he certainly knows better than anyone else what he can do with his own farm—is unwise if not dangerous in principle. It is infinitely better to induce the farmer to regulate his production through lawfully established minimum prices which will vary fairly with the size of his crops.

By wise use of the flexible tariff, automatic regulation may result, with highly beneficial consequences, not only to wheat and cotton producers, but to the entire agricultural and business community.

It is an interesting fact that since 1877 the French Government has provided a minimum price below which it is illegal to sell French wheat in that country. Germany has controlled her wheat situation in a similar manner; and England, which, like the United States, has long neglected its farmers, has recently the United States, has long neglected its farmers, has recently adopted a plan similar in principle to the French plan.

Of course, the French situation differs from ours because France produces less wheat than she consumes, while we produce a surplus over our requirements. However, the French plan is the same in principle as the plan I have discussed here. It is only in the problems of enforcement that the two plans differ.

The French farmer has consistently received a much higher price for his wheat than the American farmer, although the average wage of the French industrial worker is only about half that of the American industrial worker. The same situation exists in Germany. Thus, during the year 1931 the French insists in Germany. Thus, during the year 1931 the French in ists in Germany. Thus, during the year 1931 the French industrial worker, receiving about $2 a day, paid the French farmer $1.73 per bushel for wheat. The German industrial worker, receiving about $2 a day, paid about $1.65 per bushel for wheat. On the other hand, the American industrial worker, receiving about $4 a day, paid the American farmer only 67 cents per

This clearly illustrates how the unbalanced economic conditions in this country have been more to the advantage of the industrial worker than to the farmer. To illustrate: On the same relative basis that France and Germany protect their wheat growers, the American farmer would receive $3.50 per bushel for wheat on the basis that the industrial worker receives $4 per day in wages; but I am suggesting only $1.40 per bushel for wheat, namely, the present world price plus the proposed tariff of 65 cents per bushel.

Our Government fixed a minimum price for the 1918 and 1919 wheat crops. During both of those years wheat sold at a price well above $2 per bushel. The price of cotton, although not controlled by law, was above 30 cents per pound. These prices now seem high; yet only during the years 1918 and 1919 were the incomes of our agricultural and industrial populations in anything like proper balance.

Until we follow the example of the French and increase the purchasing power of our farmers, we are not going to emerge from the present depression unless an act of Providence comes to our rescue.

A prosperous agriculture means loaded instead of empty freight cars: live instead of dead smokestacks; active instead of idle labor; increased instead of subtracted bank deposits; renewed instead of declining activity in every line of business. We can not suspend the limb of a tree in the air and expect it to grow as we have been trying to do by giving Government aid chiefly to those at the top. We must plant the root in the ground if we would make it sound and enduring. Agricultural prosperity is the root of the problem.

JOINT ADDRESS ON GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, people everywhere have been inspired by the events relative to the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington, and likewise the youth of our country have been so inspired. I hold in my hand an address on George Washington, the joint product of three high-school boys. It is not often that we turn aside from the great and the famous to pay attention to those in a lowly position, but I think it is well worth while that this address may be published in the RECORD. One of these boys is the son of a friend of mine, a man who achieved a good place in journalism, a place he richly deserved.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Two hundred years ago George Washington was born in West-Two hundred years ago George Washington was born in West-moreland County, Va., on a large plantation situated between Popes Creek and Bridge Creek, overlooking the "River of Swans," as the lower Potomac was called. He was to lead the American forces to a glorious victory for independence; he was to be the Father of his Country, the first President of the United States; yet surely no inexorable force of destiny guided him to these heights. George Washington, the man himself, achieved them. At the time of his birth little George was already richly supplied with relatives. He had two half brothers and a half sister, along with a considerable group of cousins.

plied with relatives. He had two half brothers and a half sister, along with a considerable group of cousins.

When George was 3 the Washington family moved to a new plantation, called "Epsewasson" by the Indians, and which later came to be called Mount Vernon. Here the family lived until George was 7 years old and here his education by his father and mother was begun. Rev. Jonathan Boucher, an English clergyman, who was employed by Washington as a tutor for his stepson, said:

"George, like most people thereabouts at the time, had no other education than reading, writing, and accounts, which he was taught by a convict whom his father bought for a schoolmaster."

taught by a convict whom his father bought for a schoolmaster."

The death of his father when George was 11 was the first tragedy in a vigorous and happy boyhood. As a result the family was broken up. It was decided that George should live with his brother Austin at the old Popes Creek plantation. Here he became interested in surveying. At first he applied himself to his studies, but soon became afflicted with the spirit of adventure. Only his mother's last-minute refusal kept him from entering the British Navy.

At the age of 15 he went to live with Lawrence at Mount Ver-

British Navy.

At the age of 15 he went to live with Lawrence at Mount Vernon. Here the mastery of surveying became his objective, as surveyors in a new country were few and their earnings were exceptionally good. When George was 16, he was appointed by Lord Fairfax to aid in the survey of the Fairfax estates in the Shenandoah Valley. A close friendship developed between the two; and this curious intimacy between young George, a hardy lad of 16, and Lord Fairfax, an old Virginia gentleman, was the source of many happy memories for both.

At the age of 19, Washington seemed already to have impressed others with a belief in his force of mind and character, for at ington, retiring from further active service, married Martha Custis, a widow, and they settled down at Mount Vernon.

Washington's life for the next 20 years was merely that of a typical Virginia planter, a consistent member of the Episcopal Church, a large slaveholder, a strict but considerate master, and widely trusted man of affairs. He was repeatedly elected to the Virginia Legislature, and in 1774 the Virginia convention, appointing seven of its members delegates to the Continental Congress, named Washington as one of them.

In 1775, after the Battles of Concord and Lexington, when war with England seemed inevitable, Congress, resolved to put the Colonies in a state of defense, unanimously selected Washington commander in chief of the American forces. Refusing any salary, he accepted the position, stating, however, that he did not think himself equal to the command, and that he accepted only as a duty made imperative by the unanimity of the call.

Washington took active command of his "army" July 3 of that same year, in Boston. He was at the head of some 14,000 troops. From the first, Washington laid down the principle for himself and for all other commanders, that Congress was the absolute master. He himself was its executive, thus he established the principle that the civil government is supreme.

Washington showed his characteristic boldness in the first year of his command, by sending an expedition under Montgomery, against Montreal, and another, under Arnold, against Quebec. Both failed, but they had their compensations, since the British accumulated troops in Canada which could have been used more effectively in the insurgent Colonies.

Washington showed his military genius in 1776 by the capture of Boston, the defeat of the Hessians at Princeton, and his continued evasions of defeat at the hand of a superior British army.

tinued evasions of defeat at the hand of a superior British army. The year 1777 was notable for the surrender of Burgone at Saratoga to the army of General Gates on October 17. Following this, the British under General Howe went into winter quarters, and General Washington and his army went to Valley Forge. The rigors of winter were not the only hardships endured by Washington and his men at Valley Forge. Congress was inefficient. Three thousand soldiers were unfit for duty because they were barefoot and destitute of clothing. At times there were not three days' provisions for men or horses in camp, and often not sufficient for one day. Washington suffered in sympathy for his ragged, half-starved, poorly fed soldiers and shared every privation three days' provisions for men or horses in camp, and often not sufficient for one day. Washington suffered in sympathy for his ragged, half-starved, poorly fed soldiers and shared every privation with them. For more than six years, although within a few hundred miles of his home of ease and plenty, he did not visit it.

After the news came at Valley Forge that the French under Lafayette were to help the country, the Army was infused with new hope, but the march to Yorktown was a weary one—yet Washington never halted in the slow stubborn advance; never rested from the toil, never lost courage in the face of disaster, never lost faith nor the determination to achieve the ultimate triumph. There were difficulties with his own officers as well as with Congress. More than once the Army itself was on the verge of desertion, and it was Washington who, with supreme patience and tact, held together the disheartened soldiers. He even pledged his private fortune for the pay of the soldiers. Upon his stalwart shoulders pressed the entire burden of the Nation. There was no other American who could have stood the strain and achieved the victory. That victory came at Yorktown, Va., October of 1781. Cornwallis, the British General, was forced to surrender his entire army. Thus ended the last major conflict of the war. Peace was concluded at Versailles, France, in 1783, and America was free.

George Washington, wise and unselfish commander of a tattered citizen soldiery, had wrung victory from the seasoned legions of Europe under discouragements that would have crushed any save an indomitable spirit.

Europe under discouragements that would have crushed any save an indomitable spirit.

On Christmas eve, 1783, Washington, once more a plain American citizen, reached his home at Mount Vernon. He entered its portals with joy. He was in the prime of life, the perfect embodiment of health and vigor. His days were devoted to the development of his estate and the entertainment of his many friends. This life was a period of happiness for the general. His diary speaks of fox hunts and neighbors' visits, of experiments with fertilizers and new farm machinery. His world-wide fame was reflected in the trees and shrubs sent him from admirers all over the world. The King of Spain sent him animals. Chinese pheasants and wolfhounds came from Lafayette. During this time he took no active part in politics nor desired to take part in them. In this happiness at Mount Vernon Washington hoped to spend the remainder of his life.

But the condition of the Nation, because of the defectiveness of

But the condition of the Nation, because of the defectiveness of the Articles of Confederation, demanded action, the populace of the States was on the verge of rebellion, the Nation was bordering on anarchy. A convention met, in 1787, in reply to the demand for the purpose of discussing changes in the articles, and Washington, yielding to the insistent demand, represented Virginia at the convention.

ington, yielding to the insistent demand, represented Virginia at the convention. He was unanimously elected as presiding officer of that convention. Debates immediately ensued among the delegates as to the advisability of changes, until it was decided to create the Federal document upon which our Government is founded. On September 17, 1787, a draft of the Constitution was signed by the convention, Washington's name heading the list of signatures, and the convention adjourned.

Enough States had ratified the Constitution by 1788, and it became effective. The Electoral College, meeting in 1789, cast their votes for the Presidency; and when the votes were counted, it was found that Washington was elected as first President of the newly created United States of America, without a dissenting vote. A messenger was dispatched to carry the news to General Washington, the news that carried the unanimous tribute of the people of an entire Nation to one individual, the news that carried the unanimous gratitude of those people of that entire Nation, but the news that meant for Washington the end of the tranquil and happy days at Mount Vernon.

The office was not of his seeking. Nothing but patriotic ardor

The office was not of his seeking. Nothing but patriotic ardor could have induced him to sacrifice that tranquillity of domestic life at Mount Vernon to respond again to his country's call.

Washington's journey from his home at Mount Vernon to the then capital at New York was one triumphant journey from beginning to end.

In every town or city through which he passed he was met with wide-open arms by the people paying tribute to their hero. Dinners, speeches, special ceremonies, and entertainments were given him every place he stopped. To climax his brilliant journey he was conveyed across the bay to New York on a magnificent barge especially constructed for the occasion. His entrance into barge especially constructed for the occasion. His entrance into New York and his reception there were too magnificent to describe. On April 30, 1789, a date never to be forgotten in the annals of American history, George Washington was inaugurated first President of the United States.

The procession to Federal Hall was long and colorful, and included distinguished persons from all over the country. When Washington arrived, he was ushered into the Senate Chamber, where he was introduced to the Members of Congress. He was then conducted out on a balcony overlooking Wall Street, where he was received with the wildest acclaim.

Chancellor Robert Livingston read the oath of office, which was repeated by Washington. As he finished, a flag was raised on the Federal Hall, there was a discharge of artillery at the Battery, and all the bells of the city rang out their peals of joy. Amid this great acclaim the newly inaugurated President retired from the scene and returned to the Senate Chamber, where he delivered his inaugural address.

ered his inaugural address

Realizing the necessity for the adoption by the President of some plan for his mode of living and that as first incumbent of some pair for his mode of living and that as first incumbent of the office he must set a precedent, Washington sent out queries to many people as to their views on certain duties. He sought useful information and advice from every reliable channel, especially from persons with opposite views. An example of this is shown in his Cabinet, in which he appointed Jefferson as Secretary of State and Alexander Hamilton as Secretary of the Treasury, two men who opposed each other in practically everything that came up.

that came up.

Washington's achievements during his first term were many and varied. At first he sought to confer directly with the Senate by visiting their chambers, but this plan proved unsatisfactory, by visiting their chambers, but this plan proved unsatisfactory, so it was given up.

During his first term Washington made tours of the United States to view the industries of the people, their homes, their farms, the progress of manufactures, and the development of all natural resources. He desired to get into personal touch with the people and appeal to them for a national spirit of unity.

It was Washington's wish to retire after his first term, but his patriotism to his country in time of need outweighed his personal desires and he suffered himself to be reelected for an additional four years as Chief Executive.

Dearly as Washington was loved and highly as he was trusted and respected, many decisions in his second administration were bitterly attacked by certain groups of people.

The situation which brought much criticism upon his head was his attitude toward the French and English War. Despite Washington's gratitude toward France for her timely assistance, he felt it his duty to keep the new Union of States out of any entangle-

Another cause contributing to national unrest was the whisky rebellion, which was successfully put down by a body of militia ordered out by Washington. Other put down by a body of militia ordered out by Washington. Other causes also resulted in much national ill-feeling.

Thus the second term of Washington as President gradually came to a close. Stormy as it might seem, it took nothing away from the character and popularity of such an ideal man.

Washington persistently refused to consider a third term, so about six months before the actual end he issued his Farewell Address to the people of the United States, and at the conclusion of his term retired from public life and spent the remainder of his days in peace and quiet on his estate at Mount Vernon. days in peace and quiet on his estate at Mount Vernon.

THE TARIFF-ADDRESS OF SENATOR JAMES E. WATSON

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson] in support of the tariff principles of the Republican Party, delivered during the Lucky Strike hour over the National Broadcasting system on the evening of Tuesday, March 8, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

printed in the Record, as follows:

Among the great problems that demanded solution at the hands of President Hoover and the Republican Congress when they came into power was a revision of the tariff in accordance with the platform pledges of the party, and to its solution they devoted 17 months of time.

The first contention of the opposition with reference to this law is that it is not a limited revision as demanded by the President. What is the fact? In a report after the law had been in operation a year the Tariff Commission found that of the 3,300 dutiable items mentioned in the Fordney-McCumber Act, 890 were altered and 2,170 unchanged.

The second charge is that the duties in the present bill are unreasonably high, too many of them having been unduly increased; but the commission found that in the value of total imports the duties were raised upon 23 per cent, while upon 77 per cent they were either unchanged or lowered.

The third charge is that while the President asked in his message that the tariff be revised in the interest of agriculture, yet the manufacturers had fared better than the farmers of the country; but the Tariff Commission reported that 93 per of the country; but the Tariff Commission reported that 93 per cent of the increases are upon products of agricultural origin, while but 7 per cent are upon commodities of nonagricultural origin. And in addition to that, 130 imported articles which the farmer is compelled to buy were placed on the free list. To put it another way, the ad valorem rate on industrial products in the 1922 law was 37.35 per cent, while in the present law it is 42.63 per cent. Therefore, the per cent of increase in industrial rates in the 1930 act, as compared with the 1922 act, was but 14.6 per cent.

was but 14.6 per cent.

At the same time the computed ad valorem rate on At the same time the computed ad valorem rate on agricultural products in the act of 1922 was 22.37 per cent, while in the present law it amounts to 33.94 per cent, showing that the per cent of increase in the 1930 act over the 1922 act was 51.06 per cent. In other words, the protection to agricultural products was increased three and one-half times as much as the protection recorded the increased three and one-half times as much as the protection recorded the increased three and one-half times as much as the protection recorded the increased three and one-half times as much as the protection recorded the protection recorded the protection recorded the protection of the on afforded to industrial products.

And so in the light of the truth all of these charges fade into nothingness.

ANOTHER MISSTATEMENT

Opponents of the present law have most insistently charged from the time Congress began to consider it up to the present day that the duties levied in it were altogether above the real demands of American industry. But what is the truth as to that charge?

The fact is that on dutiable imports the rates imposed by the present law are below the McKinley law and the Dingley law, practically the same per cent as the Wilson law of Democratic origin, 1 per cent under the Payne-Aldrich law, and 3 per cent under the Fordney-McCumber law.

But a complete refutation of the charge that the present rates are "outrageous," as we hear so frequently charged, is found in the tariff ad valorem rates on all imports, both free and dutiable, under all our different tariff acts. This comparison shows that these rates are less than those imposed by any Republican tariff law passed in the last 50 years save alone those provided by the Fordney-McCumber Act. And so that charge disappears when the searchlight of truth is thrown upon it.

FOREIGN TRADE

But the most insistent assault upon the new law is made on the theory that it has destroyed our foreign trade. There has need been a tariff act passed since the Republican Party came into power that has not met with an unceasing fusillade of such charges, and yet they have not been sustained in a single instance and can not be now.

and can not be now.

For months we listened to these same charges against the Dingley law, and yet under its operation our foreign commerce increased one billion four hundred millions.

From the beginning of the life of the Republic to the passage of the Dingley law in 1898 the total value of all exports over all imports amounted to $100,000,000, but the average annual value of our exports over our imports during the entire life of that law amounted to $475,000,000—not, mind you, for the entire duration of that act but for each year it remained on the statute books—and this in the face of the most violent assertions, repeated for months in both the House and Senate, that its passage would utterly ruin our foreign trade.

Under the Payne-Aldrich law we increased our foreign commerce $1.300,000,000, and all this right in the teeth of the most persistent

$1,300,000,000, and all this right in the teeth of the most persistent declarations, made on the floor of both the House and the Senate for months, that that law could do nothing else but destroy our foreign trade.

foreign trade.

And under the Fordney-McCumber law that trade increased $2,607,000,000 in what we bought of and sold to the other people of the world, and yet throughout its entire consideration we heard nothing but the most doleful prophecies as to the disastrous results that would necessarily flow from the passage of that law.

And while our foreign trade has decreased since the passage of the present act, is there anyone so bold as to claim that the tariff law had anything to do with it? If so, let him produce his facts, his figures, his arguments that are at all tenable to prove so insupportable a theory.

That this law has nothing to do with this condition is avidenced.

portable a theory.

That this law has nothing to do with this condition is evidenced by the fact that the imports and exports of every nation on earth have fallen in an equivalent degree, and that all nations, and not we alone, have suffered because of existing economic conditions.

And how could we be expected to increase the sale of our products to Europe during this time when they have been suffering from a greater degree of prostration than the United States, and when they have been compelled to appeal to this country to save them from the disastrous, if not the fatal, conditions with which they are struggling? Their people can not buy their own prodthey are struggling? Their people can not buy their own products; how then can they be expected to buy ours? We can not sell our products to our own people; how then could we have bought, or how can we now buy, the products of other people?

No man can fathom the intellectual processes of those gentlemen who insist that the way to make our country prosperous is to pull who insist that the way to make our country prosperous is to pull down our tariff and permit an influx of products from abroad, produced by laborers who receive from one-fourth to one-half of the wages paid in our own country for producing the same products. That policy, instead of increasing the power of their people to sell in this land, would decrease the ability of our own people to buy, either Europe's products or our own, and how can that possibly benefit any man living under our flag?

Their alleged argument proceeds on the theory that we must

Their alleged argument proceeds on the theory that we must largely import the products of other nations in order to be prosperous ourselves, but this statement is fallacious. Our total imports last year amounted to $2,090,000,000, and of that amount at least one-third was noncompetitive. For instance, our imports of rubber, raw silk, tropical fruits, and many other products of like character that we either do not or can not produce in this country run up to one-third of our total imports.

They are free, and should be, because a tariff on them would not protect any industry here; but it is not true that we are compelled to import the products of other people that compete with the products of our own people in our own land, and to that extent displace the products of our own workmen, in order to be

Nor is it true that it is necessary to make us prosperous, or that it in any wise adds to our prosperity, to admit competing products which are produced at a less cost than we can produce them in America. To the extent of their value we supplant American products, and to the same extent we displace American labor; and it is not necessary to do that in order to be prosperous.

Nor is it necessary to buy in order to sell. Other nations do

Nor is it necessary to buy in order to sell. Other nations do not purchase of us because they love us, because no other nation on earth loves us, but because they are either compelled to come here and buy what they want or because of our improved machinery and superskilled labor we can produce it better for the same price than elsewhere on earth, and they will continue to buy of us under these conditions whether we buy anything of them or not.

Our total exports last year were something over $3,000,000,000, and for the period from 1921 to 1925 the average annual exports of raw cotton alone amounted to over $800,000,000. That product of raw cotton alone amounted to over $800,000,000. That product they must continue to buy here in large part if they continue to use it at all, and the same is true of various other things we produce. It is desirable that we should export, but it is not necessary for us to give up any portion of our home market in order to be able to supply others.

And in this connection it is worthy of note, too, that last year the decline in free imports was much greater than the decline in dutiable imports, showing that our tariff has nothing whatever to do with the falling off in our trade. That decline amounted to do with the falling off in our trade. That decline amounted to $684,000,000 of foreign products that were admitted here free, while there was a falling off of but $377,000,000 in the value of dutiable imports that entered our ports.

HOME MARKET

In considering this problem our friends overlook altogether the tremendous importance of the home market. In 1929 the value of all agricultural products amounted to $11,775,000,000 and of all manufactured products to $68,453,000,000, or a total of $80,229,-000,000, while in 1930 we exported but $3,781,000,000 and in 1931 $2,377,000,000.

These figures show us that with the enactment of a proper protective tariff we are seeking to preserve for the American manufacturer and the American farmer, employing American labor, the big part of our home market, which consumes $80,000,000,000 of products annually. Added to this we must remember the millions that are employed in the distribution of these products. If we could but calculate the value of our domestic products at domestic could but calculate the value of our domestic products at domestic prices the amount would be staggering.

So that if by pulling down the tariff to a point below the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad we enable our foreign competitors to take over a part of the American market, we are sacrificing a portion of that $30,000,000,000 of business we do right at home to foreign competition, while at the same time the most that we ever have been able to export amounted to $5,000,000,000, thereby offering to sacrifice a part of an $80,000,000,000,000 market to enhance a $5,000,000,000 sale.

PRESENT FIGURES

And in the midst of all this discussion let us not forget three salient features—one that notwithstanding the cry that our tariff is preventing imports from abroad, yet 70 per cent of all such imports come in free of duty, a much larger per cent than under any other tariff law ever enacted by the Republican Party.

Second, that we have high Democratic authority for the statement that the price of commodities in America does not depend upon the amount we export but upon steady domestic consump-

Third. That 15 countries have gone off of the gold standard, thus reducing the per cent of tariff they pay on imports into this country by from 25 to 30 per cent. In 1930, 43 per cent of the total imports into the United States came from countries which are on a depreciated-currency basis, these imports amounting to $1,726,000,000, so that on all of these products, greatly to the detriment of the American producer, the tariff is reduced at least 25 per cent below the water provided by the Hawley Spect least 25 per cent below the rates provided by the Hawley-Smoot law

Our Democratic friends have engaged in a campaign of epithets, constantly assailing the tariff law by characterizing it as "outrageous" and "infamous" and "monstrous," but not one of rageous and 'mamous' and "monstrous," but not one of them has yet been bold enough to tell us what he would do with these rates if given power to act. They are in full charge of the House of Representatives, where all tariff legislation must originate. They are in perfect command of the Committee on Ways and Means, which formulates all bills relating to revenue. And yet, after months of unremitting assault upon the Hawley-Smoot bill, and after such a flood of denunciation of this measure as this bill, and after such a flood of denunciation of this measure as this country has not heard before even with reference to any other tariff act, they have not offered one single amendment to any existing rate but are permitting them all to stand unchallenged except by general charges of "outrageous" and "infamous."

THE UNDERWOOD-SIMMONS ACT

Do our Democratic friends want to go back to their last expression in law of their views on the tariff? Will they be so bold as to assert that that is their intention? In it they put the following farm products on the free list; no tariff whatever on any one of them:

Alfalfa, bacon, ham, beef, veal, buckwheat, casein, cattle, clover seed, corn, cheese, cream, fresh eggs, lard, milk, mutton, pork, sheep, swine, rye, wheat, and wool; the whole range of agricultural products.

The war, while it lasted, prevented the full effects of this act being felt in this country; but, when that struggle was over, the farmer was plunged into such a condition of dire distress that among was pringed into such a condition of the distress that almost the first things the Harding administration did was to pass an emergency tariff law, confined to agricultural products alone, in order to save that industry from the withering effects of the last Democratic tariff law. Is it their intention, if given power, to Democratic tariff law. return to those rates?

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE

And their only remedy is to provide an international commission to aid us in adjusting our tariff rates. This is the first time This is the first time in the history of America that it has been deliberately proposed to turn over the tariff policy of our country to an international commission composed of people who are hostile to our entire protective policy and whose only thought and purpose is to so arrange our tariff rates as to enable them to enter this, the mightiest market of the earth, made so by the protective policy of the market of the earth, made so by the protective policy of the Republican Party.

And after our experience with European governments in all matters pertaining to and arising out of the late war, I am wondering how the American people will relish a proposal to call an international conference to agree upon the tariff policy of America. We believe that we have reached our present position among the nations of the world by attending to our own affairs and lending our assistance to other nations if and when we believed it essential, and doubtless we shall continue to pursue that policy; but, since the adoption of the preamble to the League of Nations covenant, we have not heard of any other proposal that commits us to international domination and to the determination of our national policies by the alien powers of the earth. And we do not believe that the American people will tamely submit to a proposition of that kind. tion of that kind.

INVESTIGATION OF COAL-MINING CONDITIONS IN KENTUCKY

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. Norris] a question. About two weeks ago Senate Resolution No. 178, authorizing an investigation of coal-mining conditions in Kentucky, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. May I inquire of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether the committee will soon be prepared to report on

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I have often stated heretofore, I can not offer, much as I should like to do so and much as I sympathize with the object of the resolution, any suggestion that the committee will be able to report in the very near future, because of the large amount of other work that the committee has had in charge for some time; and it is going to be some time before I can see relief.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, unless the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary objects, I desire at this time to move that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of the resolution in question and that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that motion being made by the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, the Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from the further consideration of Senate Resolution 178, and it will be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I inquire when it would be possible to bring the subject of Philippine independence to a vote in the Senate? It seems that on a subject of this importance, which has been before the Congress for a long time and on which two committees-the Senate committee and the House committee—have favorably reported by practically unanimous votes, before other great measures now pending come over from the House, there should be some definite determination as to a vote in the Senate.

Mr. President, in 1924 the House committee reported a bill for Philippine independence. In 1930 the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs conducted long hearings; witnesses were brought from various portions of the country, and a report was submitted to the Senate favoring Philippine independence. At this session of Congress a new bill was presented following the philosophy of the bill presented in 1924. This bill was prepared by the War Department and had been recommended by Secretary Weeks. As it is reported now it contains some new provisions, but the committee is unanimous on one point, and that is that a condition of uncertainty exists which calls for a decision upon the part of the Congress. All the witnesses who appeared before the House committee and before the Senate committee, with only on exception, agreed whether they were for independence or opposed to independence, that a situation of uncertainty existed which should be decided by this Congress.

Union labor with its 5,000,000 membership, farm organizations with their membership of some 4,000,000, and various business organizations have placed themselves on record as being in favor of action on this subject at this session, and from the Pacific coast there comes the unanimous demand that the matter of limitation of immigration from the Philippine Islands be settled. Supplementing the request from the Pacific coast we find the American Legion indorsing exclusion of Philippine immigrants. But we found in both Houses, and especially in the Senate, a feeling that to limit or change the economic relations now subsisting between the islands and our people prior to a definite declaration of policy as to our future intent would be an immoral act; that it would be repugnant to a sense of right and justice to attempt to handle matters affecting tariff or immigration or limitations until the policy of the United States regarding independence had been settled. Both Senators and Congressmen have stated that they favored limitations and exclusions, but would not vote for either until independence was decided upon and a definite date set for the termination of our sovereignty. Only one witness before either the Senate or House committees even indicated that such a course could be justified. The business of the islands and the business of our people require the setting of a definite date for separation.

I venture the assertion, Mr. President, that there will not be a handful of votes in the Senate against this bill when it shall reach its final form, and it is my belief that in the House there will not be 75 votes against a bill.

The opposition to it in its present form is a disguised opposition. There are a few men in our country who are still imperialists, but they are very few, and no witnesses appearing before either the House committee or the Senate committee had the hardihood or temerity to discuss permanent retention of the Philippine Islands, and no bill proposing a new colonial policy has been presented. The attempt to establish a colonial policy seems to have been abandoned, and there remain only a few questions to be decided, such as the question of time, the question of limitations, the question of defining a period between the time of our decision to grant independence and the time when independence should become a fact.

I do not know of a single leader on the Republican side or on the Democratic side of this Chamber who does not favor a declaration of independence for the Philippine Islands. It may be true, Mr. President, that there is some slight disagreement as to the period of preparation, and I believe the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERGI desires to present a substitute plan, and that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. King] desires a shorter period, but on the broad question of the necessity for definite action at this session of the Congress there is no disagreement.

I do not at this time desire to move to take up this bill. but I believe that some general agreement should be arrived at that it can be done within the next two or three weeks.

I am under the impression that five hours on the House side and two or three days on this side would dispose of the question.

Last week I listened to a day's debate on the subject of a collector of customs. It was a proper debate. For nearly a week, time was consumed on the question of the Indians and Indian reservations, involving the welfare of some 250,000 ing priority always given, and properly given, to appropriation bills. I assume that the committee would wish its pro-

This is a question that involves the welfare of 13,000,000 people, far distant in Asia, and of our own interests in the matter. I, therefore, ask the chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs if he has any definite program or suggestion as to when this matter can be brought to a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may state that this can be done only by unanimous consent. We have not passed the order of presentation of reports of committees or introduction of bills. If there is no objection—

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. No Senator has suggested that the Senator from Missouri was proceeding improperly. He is evidently proceeding by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is why the Chair did not call attention to the matter while the Senator was speaking; but the Chair thinks it is his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the morning business has not been concluded. Of course, the matter is in the hands of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, it was not my intention to occupy very much of the Senate's time this morning.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I sympathize most heartily with everything the Senator from Missouri has said. I am just as anxious as he is to get this bill up. I have repeatedly spoken about it to some of the members of the steering committee of the majority, expressing my hope that it might be brought forward at a very early date. I have stated that I did not think it would lead to prolonged debate; and I think that two days might easily dispose of the speeches that would be made. I am sure that neither the Senator from Missouri nor the chairman of the committee will take up very much time.

I agree with the Senator entirely that it is a matter of the very greatest importance to 13,000,000 wards of the United States that this question be settled at the earliest possible date; and I shall be glad to cooperate with him in every way possible to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate.

I am not a member of the steering committee. I have no means of forcing them in any way to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate. I do hope, however, that the leaders on both sides of the aisle will see to it that this matter shall be given a couple of days' debate in the very near future, in order that it may be determined, and in order that our friends and wards may know definitely what Congress proposes to do, particularly what the Senate—which has spent so much time in the study of this matter in the past few years—intends to do in the matter.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, may I ask the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg], chairman of the program committee, what he thinks are the prospects of placing this bill upon his program?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think the able and earnest Senator from Missouri knows how heartily I sympathize with his objective. He has been exceedingly zealous and courteous throughout the consideration of the bill in committee in endeavoring to meet conflicting views. Unfortunately, we have not entirely enjoyed a meeting of minds, although we do agree that a definite independence formula is due the Filipinos under our trust obligation. The fact remains that whatever differences remain should be liquidated on the floor of the Senate. They should not prevent debate and conclusion at this session.

So far as the steering committee is concerned—and I am speaking only as one member of it—I remind the Senator that we reported a program on the 28th of February with three suggested measures given priority. That agreement was entered into in conjunction with the leaders upon the Democratic side as well as the leaders upon the Republican side. Thus far we have been unable to reach even the first suggested measure upon that program, because of the standing priority always given, and properly given, to appropriation bills. I assume that the committee would wish its program as already announced to continue. Subsequent thereto there must be a decision as to which among several highly important measures must be given priority. Certainly, the Philippine bill is among these measures. So is Senate Joint Resolution 76, which would arm the President with needed authority to redistribute and consolidate Federal bureaus and commissions in the desperately important quest of economy. It seems to me that this and kindred matters are of prime concern. It is our problem to find the most useful order in which these measures can become the Senate's unfinished business.

I remind the Senator, for instance, that the Muscle Shoals legislation is again pending in the Senate and that the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] is highly anxious that it should have its earliest possible day in court. I remind the Senator that additional banking legislation will probably be upon the Senate's calendar within the next week or 10 days. These and other matters will have to be relatively considered in the full committee with a purpose of reaching the best possible conclusion with a view to the interests of all concerned.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I assure the Senator of my anxiety to conclude the Philippine question effectually, and with finality, before this session of Congress adjourns. The Senator is wholly justified in his attitude. With the added assurance that I shall sympathetically seek to hasten its consideration, the Senator will understand that I can not give him a further commitment at the present time.

Mr. HAWES. May I ask the Senator a question? He is a keen observer of affairs in the Senate. Does the Senator anticipate that it would require more than two days' debate to settle the matter?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should think it would require more than two days, Mr. President. I am hoping myself to submit to the Senate a substitute measure which will represent the views of at least one section of public opinion which disagrees with some of the details of the Senator's bill, although we do not disagree with the fundamental purpose to fix a definite independence formula. Personally, I can conclude in one hour any presentation I have to make upon the subject when the time comes.

Mr. HAWES. May I ask a question of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] in this connection? I am trying to ascertain the possibility of bringing before the Senate the question of Philippine independence for final determination. So far as I can ascertain, it will not require more than two days to discuss it. I am wondering if the Senator can encourage me in any way to believe that we can bring it up at any early date and dispose of it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that during any morning hour other than the hour of Monday the Senator may move to take up his bill for two hours' consideration until 2 o'clock, at which time it would be displaced by the unfinished business. If that is not ample time, if the Senator is looking for a secure place, he probably should follow the program as it has been arranged by the steering committee. The Senator, of course, is conversant with that program. How long that will take depends entirely upon the amount of debate that ensues from the consideration of each item on the program.

Of course, the Senator need not be content with a program. If he has the desire, and the votes to support his desire, he may displace any business that is pending before the Senate, or interrupt the processes that have been laid out by the steering committee.

Mr. HAWES. I am quite sure such a motion would prevail; but the friends of independence do not desire to be precipitate or to force a vote. All they desire is the certainty that a vote and decision shall be arrived at within the next few weeks.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator probably is asking me for an estimate of time on the assumption that he is willing to follow through the program that has been arranged by the steering committee. That program consists first of the appropriation bills; next, the tariff bill, to be followed by a resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], then to be followed by a naval construction bill; and that is the end of the program that has been outlined by the committee.

The Senator is entitled to early consideration for his bill, of course, because it involves and presents a very important subject matter. It is my opinion that the Senator probably could reach his Philippine bill in the natural course of events within the next three weeks. That, of course, is just an estimate, however.

Mr. HAWES. I thank the Senator. A vote, if assured, would be satisfactory.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Missouri that the bill which he is now discussing was not reported from the committee and placed on the calendar until the day after the steering committee had presented its program. It has been the custom in the past for steering committees to revise their programs from time to time, taking cognizance of the new bills on the calendar and attempting to arrange them in the order of precedence, even though some of the bills have been on the calendar longer than others. So may I suggest to him that it might be well for him to ask the chairman of the steering committee for an opportunity to present reasons why the present program should be revised.

Mr. HAWES. I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator. Mr. President, I ask permission to insert at this time in the body of the RECORD the report of your Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs made to the present Congress. All of the members of this committee, without exception, are in favor of a solution of the Philippine problem. Two or three of the members are in disagreement in the matter of time or limitations, but on the subject of a definite decision in this Congress they are unanimous.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

For a generation the Philippine problem has confronted the American people. It involves American-Philippine political and economic relations, and the fulfillment of our promise of independence. This bill provides sound, feasible, and fair methods of substituting a definite policy for one of evasion and indecision.

Virtually every witness who testified at the extended hearings conducted by the committee has expressed the view that the present uncertainty characterizing our relations with the Philippine Islands should be removed. Further delay threatens to be prejudicial to the best interests of both the United States and the Philippine Islands.

FAR EASTERN SITUATION

The present situation in the Orient should not prevent Congress from taking definite action at this time. Unsettled conditions in the Far East may continue indefinitely; they may be settled at any time. But the varying fortunes of conflicting forces on the other side of the Pacific can not justly be set up by us as an excuse for delaying the solution of our own problems.

The fulfillment of our duty toward the Philippines must be determined upon the basis of the welfare of the people of the United States and the 13,000,000 people of the Philippine Islands. To change at this time a long-established national policy because of conditions for which we are not responsible and over which we have no immediate control will be interpreted as timidity or have no immediate control will be interpreted as timidity or weakness.

FACTORS RECONCILED

The recommended bill harmonizes previous divergent views of different groups likely to be affected by Philippine independence. The American farmer, speaking through the three national farm federations, and the dairy organizations, is seeking protection from Philippine competition in our markets. The American workingman through the American Federation of Labor, and organizations on the Pacific coast, and the American Legion, are demanding the exclusion of Filippine immigrants as well as protection from ing the exclusion of Filipino immigrants as well as protection from duty-free Philippine articles produced at lower labor costs.

Nor can the rights and interests of the Filipino justly be ignored. He, too, is under the American flag, and that not by his own choice but by our own will and purpose. While he remains under our sovereignty he should not be discriminated against. It would be politically immoral to retain indefinitely the Filipino people in their present status as wards and at the same time impose upon them discrimination and unfair restrictions and inhibitions.

We have also to consider our promise to grant independence to the Filipino people. By the declaration of our political parties, by the utterances of our Presidents, by an enactment of Congress, we have pledged our word as a nation that they should at some time be free and independent. This we can not evade.

INDEPENDENCE—" WHEN " AND " HOW

Only two questions require decision—first, "When shall the Philippines be granted independence?" and, second, "How should it be granted, so as to protect both Philippine and American welfare?" welfare?

To achieve these purposes the bill in the main provides that-PHILIPPINE AUTONOMY

1. The Philippine people shall adopt a constitution for the government of the "Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands," pendernment of the "Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands," ernment of the "Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands," pending complete independence. Under that government they will enjoy complete autonomy as to domestic affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations specified in the bill that safeguard both the sovereignty and responsibilities of the United States.

TRADE LIMITATION

2. Pending final withdrawal of American sovereignty, free importations of certain Philippine products into the United States shall not exceed specified limits, based upon the status quo as represented by estimated importations from existing investments.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTIONS

3. Pending independence Philippine immigration to the United States is limited to a maximum annual quota of 100.

COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

4. At the end of a 15-year period from the date of inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, the people of the islands shall, at a plebiscite, vote on the question of independence, and if a majority favor independence the President is directed to recognize and declare the independence of the Philippine Islands, whereupon, for all purposes, they will become to the United States a foreign nation.

These provisions establish a process for the independence of the Philippine people and the adjustment in an orderly manner of our economic and other relations with them. They provide the erection of the new Philippine national structure and at the same time a safe and satisfactory transition from the present dependent to the future independent status.

GRADUAL TRADE ADJUSTMENT

Twenty-five years ago free-trade relations were established between the United States and the Philippine Islands. This was done by the American Congress against the expressed desire and despite the opposition of the people of the islands. As a consequence of free trade, Philippine industries and trade with the United States have developed on that basis.

This arrangement resulted in an artificial stimulation in the production of certain articles and manufactures in the Philippines and an extraordinary increase in the volume of Americanoines, and an extraordinary increase in the volume of American-Philippine trade, with a corresponding decrease in the trade of the islands with foreign countries.

Obviously, the existing free trade relations between the United States and the Philippines can not be terminated abruptly without serious injury to Philippine economic interests and American trade with the islands. Both require a definite time to prepare for the change. Investment made on the basis of free trade must be given sufficient time for adjustment or liquidation without loss. Philippine industries must be given time to establish themselves on a competitive basis before they are placed outside the tariff walls of the United States.

MORAL OBLIGATION

The United States owes a moral obligation to the Filipino people in this respect. The existence of this obligation can not be too strongly urged. We can not justify an act which might result in the destruction of the economic structure that we helped to build in the Philippines, with the consequent lowering of stand-orderly transfers of sovereignty have usually been accompanied by such provisions as those proposed in this bill. When the Philippines were ceded to the United States by Spain we agreed by treaty to permit Spain for 10 years to send her merchandise and her ships to the Philippines on the same basis as ours. We did this because we realized that we would injure Philippine and Spanish interests if we abruptly forced on the Philippine Islands a different arrangement.

The committee examined the various proposals as to the time at which independence should be granted. There were proposals for immediate independence, for independence in 5 years, for independence in 10 years, and for independence in 20 years. The reasons urged in behalf of each were considered. Your committee concluded that a period of 15 years was required for the necessary readjustments. Some members of the committee yielded their preference for earlier independence on the basis of evidence developed at the hearings. There was unanimous agreement that a definite date for independence should be set.

During the first 10 years of the 15-year period there is to be a limitation on importations from the Philippines to the United States as already indicated.

GRADUATED TARIFF

GRADUATED TARIFF

At the end of the first 10 years there begins a gradually increasing tariff levy in the nature of an export tax imposed and collected by the Philippine government on all Philippine free exports to the United States. From the eleventh to the fifteenth year the tax will rise from 5 per cent to 25 per cent of the American tariff on like articles imported from foreign countries. Products on the general free list of the American tariff will not under the bill be subject to this tax.

considerations dictated this procedure. main Three main considerations dictated this procedure. First, to permit Philippine industries to adjust themselves to the new conditions following independence; second, to induce the Filipino people to diversify their products on a competitive basis and to find new markets for them; third, to protect American agriculture, labor, and industry.

PAYMENT OF BONDED INDEBTEDNESS

One additional reason prompted this provision. It will permit the Philippine Islands to discharge its bonded indebtedness prior to independence, for the bill requires that all collections from this tax shall constitute a special fund to be used exclusively for the retirement of the outstanding indebtedness of the Philippine Islands. It is believed that at the end of the 15-year period the bonded indebtedness of the islands will have been paid.

UNITED STATES SOVEREIGNTY UNIMPAIRED

The sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands during the 15-year period continues unimpaired. The United States also retains such authority in the government of the Philippine Islands as is commensurate with its responsibilities. But it is in the nature of reserved powers and authority rather than of is in the nature of reserved powers and authority rather than of actual and affirmative participation in the government. The authority can be exercised when the necessity for it arises. Additional power is unnecessary. These powers extend to the safe-guarding of the finances of the Fhilippine nation, its currency, its foreign trade, its public lands and mines, public order, and all those activities and services of the government necessary for the protection of life, liberty, and property. It is also provided that foreign relations of the islands shall be exclusively under the control and supervision of the United States, and that our Government at any time may intervene to prevent a violation of international obligations. national obligations.

RECOGNITION OF AMERICAN AUTHORITY

Pending the consummation of independence United States sovereignty will be represented in the Philippines by a high commissioner, who shall be recognized as such representative by all the sioner, who shall be recognized as such representative by all the departments of the Philippine government.

The high commissioner will act as the representative of the United States, and he is vested with all of the prestige and authority required for the discharge of such responsibility. He shall have access to all of the records of the government and have means at his disposal to acquaint himself with the manner in which the government of the Commonwealth is conducted.

Should any of the aventualities described in the bill invalid

Should any of the eventualities described in the bill, involving either the finances or the orderly functioning of the government, occur, the way is clear for the exercise of authority by the United States to remedy such conditions.

The governmental powers reserved to the United States and the United States high commissioner are effective to insure an efficient administration of public affairs in the Philippines.

MILITARY AND NAVAL BASES

Under the provisions of this bill the United States also reserves Under the provisions of this bill the United States also reserves the right to retain its present military, naval, and other reservations in the Philippine Islands. It is also provided that after independence the United States may obtain, by lease or purchase, any additional territory in the Philippine Islands as it may consider necessary for such purposes. There is no provision in the bill to prevent the withdrawal or abandonment of these naval and military posts at any time, or at the end of the 15-year period. That question is left to future decision and determination.

The bill provides that after the people of the Philippine Islands have voted for independence, and prior to the final withdrawal of American sovereignty, a conference of representatives of the American and Philippine Governments shall be held for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands.

CONCLUSION

The recognized policy of the United States in the Philippines has been to prepare the Philippine people for independence. Every Chief Executive since our occupation of the islands down to the present time has stated that we were in the islands for the purpose of assistance rather than colonization. Every legislative act congress has contemplated ultimate independence. pose of assistance rather than colonization. Every legislative act of Congress has contemplated ultimate independence. For 30 years every act of the American Government in the islands has been based upon and in furtherance of this policy.

We have done much for these people. Americans may justly say that we have accomplished for the Filipino people in 30 years what no other nation has done for the people of its colonization in hundred works. And the Philippine people appreciate that fact a hundred years. And the Philippine people appreciate that fact, and they are grateful to America for it.

The rest they must do and achieve by themselves. And they can only have this opportunity if, as this bill provides, they are permitted to lead their own life, enjoying their independence, free permitted to lead their own life, enjoying their independence, free to exercise their own genius, and thrown on their own resources. Every condition precedent that we have imposed upon them has been fulfilled. They now have a stable government. We can no longer postpone a definite solution of the question of independence without serious injustice. The Filipino people unitedly are respectfully, but with insistence, urging their independence. Further delay will not be understood by them and can not be justified by us.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, in the Seventy-first Congress your Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs held long hearings; witnesses appeared from various portions of the country representing all elements of our political life, business men, farm organizations, labor organizations, magazine writers, Government officials; and it was disclosed in these hearings that there was general agreement amongst those who favored independence and those who opposed it that a situation of uncertainty was paralyzing economic progress in the Philippines, and a situation that was injurious to American interests, which calls for decision. Every witness that appeared at this time agreed that a definite, defined policy should be entered into quickly by the Congress

The report at the conclusion of these hearings was long and voluminous. It is not necessary to repeat it all, but the conclusions arrived at by the committee are important, and I ask that they be inserted in the body of the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONCLUSIONS

From the foregoing, the following conclusions may be drawn: (1) That it is the policy of the American Government to free rather than retain the Philippines.

(2) That the Philippine people are justified in their plea for independence at this time.

(3) That the Philippine people have made remarkable strides in

(4) That the Philippine people have made remarkable strates in the path of self-government.
(4) That at the present time the Philippine people are conducting, except in a few instances, the affairs of government.
(5) That the Philippine people are keenly alive to the untoward eventualities of independence.

(6) That the Philippine people, realizing serious hardships may result from independence and from the loosening of the ties that now bind them to American sovereignty, prefer to risk these hardships at the present time, when they are confident of their ability to endure them, than at a remote date when the hazards of separation from the American Government would be so great as either to threaten disaster or to preclude their independence.

(7) That, so far as the interests of Americans are concerned in Philippine trade, it will be more simple to grant independence at an early date than when their interests have a deeper and more far-reaching contact with the Philippines.

an early date than when their interests have a deeper and more far-reaching contact with the Philippines.

(8) That at the present time the conditions existing in the Philippines and the uncertainty of the future status of these islands is operating to dwarf their initiative, handicap their agricultural and industrial development, hamper their efforts to obtain investments of foreign capital, and militate against their enjoying the full possibilities of their economic development.

(9) That there are important elements, both American and Philippine, whose interests demand some action on the part of Congress in the settlement of this national uncertainty.

(10) That the action of the American Government in relation to the Philippines will determine America's prestige in the Orient.

(11) That the Philippine Islands, of doubtful advantage at the present, from a purely trade standpoint, have little or no utility in times of war and might even become a burden and a threat to us in the event of our embroilment with certain powers.

(12) That proposals to postpone the date for the granting of Philippine independence for any great number of years will result in the expansion of certain economic ties which may ultimately make impossible the granting of independence.

sion should interfere with the redemption of our pledges to these people.

(14) That the Philippine people are unanimous in their demand for early and complete independence.

The United States owes a solemn duty to the Philippine people—the duty of an honest declaration of our future intent. If we have decided to retain these islands under some form of colonial government, we should be frank enough to proclaim it. We should not further encourage national aspirations to ultimate independence on the part of the Philippine people if we are ourselves opposed to their independence. selves opposed to their independence.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HAWES. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, before the end of this session the Senate will vote on the subject of Philippine independence.

The facts connected with our early occupancy of the islands have been more or less obscured. Their development, their readiness for independence, and their unanimity of appeal for it, are all subjects upon which the Congress should protected and the United States was their protector. On the other hand, Washington seems to have realized that the Filipinos have full and complete information.

There recently appeared in the Baltimore Sun a résumé of the situation, interesting and informative, by P. Stewart Macaulay, an able analyst and writer. I ask that portions of it which seem to be pertinent be printed in the body of the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs for their consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The independence movement on the islands really began while the Spaniards still were in control and years before Dewey's specthe Spaniards still were in control and years before Dewey's spectacular naval victory in Manila Bay over a ludicrously inferior and almost unresisting Spanish squadron. Under the leadership of the youthful and spirited Aguinaldo it had reached respectable proportions by 1898. Dewey recognized this fact and he was not slow to profit by it. He rescued Aguinaldo from exile in Hong Kong, set him ashore on the islands, and wished him godspeed in his offert to rescue an error for the purpose of destroying Spanish his effort to raise an army for the purpose of destroying Spanish outposts.

In both these endeavors the Filipino leader was amazingly successful. Natives flocked to his standard in such numbers that he was not able to equip all of them with guns. In a series of brilliant assaults he mopped up virtually all of the outlying Spanish garrisons and then, with captured arms and augmented forces, he turned on Manila itself. While Dewey lay in the bay, unable to capture the city because land forces had not yet arrived from the United States, Aguinaldo probably could have taken the city with ease. But he postponed the assault, on Dewey's request, until the Americans arrived. Meanwhile, he had set up a provisional independent Philippine Government with himself at its head—and that is where all the trouble started.

There are still many different opinions as to the justice or the injustice of the American attitude toward the Filipino insurgents. No one denies that it was vigorous in the extreme. Up until Au-

No one denies that it was vigorous in the extreme. Up until August, when General Anderson arrived with troops from the United States, there is no doubt that Dewey and Aguinaldo had worked in perfect harmony. The former, in his dispatches, reported as much, pointing out that Aguinaldo was most obedient to his suggestions, that his forces, in capturing the Spanish outposts and investing Manila itself, were actually saving the American troops (which had not yet arrived) by doing most of their work. Aguinaldo, on his part, looked upon the Americans as liberators of his people. He believed all during this early period that, in ridding the islands of Spaniards, he was opening the way for the establishment of an independent Philippine government. And nothing on the record indicates that he received from Dewey or any other American source a single intimation, that his hopes in any other American source a single intimation that his hopes in this respect were not in accord with the policy of the United

Then General Anderson arrived. He found that the insurgents had encircled the entire city with a system of trenches, that food and water supplies had been cut off effectually, and that the population within the encircling insurgent line was on the point population within the encircling insurgent line was on the point of starvation. The American general politely requested Aguinaldo to move some of his troops so that Americans might occupy a section of the earthworks. The Filipino leader obliged, the Americans took their stations, a few shots were fired, and a white flag was raised above the city. It is clear that for reasons of his own the Spanish commander was willing to surrender to the United States, but not to the Filipinos.

As soon as the white flag appeared General Anderson took complete charge of the negotiations leading up to the surrender of the Spaniards. He was in position to dictate terms, but in fact he made one concession which, no matter how wise it may have ne made one concession which, no matter now wise it may have seemed at the time, certainly had disastrous results. The Spaniards, still resolute against the Filipino army, demanded that the occupation of the city be accomplished with American troops only; that no Filipinos be permitted to take part. Anderson agreed and sent word to Aguinaldo to move his troops back from the outskirts. Even though the insurgent leader must have been sadly disappointed at seeing all the honors of a victory that really was his going to troops which had played only a small part in it, he acquiesced and, on the surface at least, no enmity was displayed on either side.
